The power of the church now is just what it then was, with the added record of its achievements during the centuries since. The same spirit of service which led Peter to heal Eneas and which Dorcas showed in ministering to the needy is the spirit which wins now. The same affection among disciples which rejoiced in Dorcas living and mourned her dead, and which turned to Peter for comfort and deliverance, is a power in the church today. The same simple gospel of repentance for sin and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ is to be preached in the same spirit of ministering love. The church does not now work miracles of healing and raising the dead, because there are greater works witnessing to the divine power dwelling in it. But it works along the same lines with larger results. Not long ago, in Joppa, near where Dorcas once lived, I visited the home of a Christian physician, educated in the Syrian Protestant college at Beirut, which was planted and is maintained by American Christians. He has charge of a large hospital, while two score or more patients visit him daily, coming from Lydda and other towns in the plain of Sharon and from greater distances. Many a sick Eneas finds relief at his hands, and if Dorcas is not raised from the dead many women are kept from dying and many more are busily engaged, as Dorcas was, in ministering to the needs of the sick and poor. One of them is the doctor's American wife, whose home is as truly filled with the spirit of Christ as any in this land of ours. By such ministries the Christian Church is doing the greater works which its Master promised to his disciples. It has tamed savage tribes, banished slavery and cruelty, caused lives of self-sacrifice which have commanded the admiration of the world and filled multitudes with a love and devotion inspired of God.

The achievements already gained are the warrant for greater triumphs in the future. The spirit of Christ is being felt in its power over the world as never before. His command to preach the gospel to all the nations is laid on us, and with it is his assurance, "All authority has been given unto me, in heaven and on earth . . . and lo, I am with you alway."

LIFE AND LETTERS OF WILLIAM BARTON ROGERS

Professor Rogers's name is still a power here in Boston. He has been dead only fifteen years and his features, his distinguished attainments and his personal popularity will not soon be forgotten. He was the founder, more than any one else, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in this city, which now has the dimensions and influence of a great university, and which owes its pre-eminently successful career to the wisdom of Professor Rogers in shaping its course from the outset, as well as to the influence and enthusiasm which both by example and by precept he communicated to his associates and successors. This elaborate, but never wearisome, story of his career, which is in two volumes, is the work of his wife, who has had the aid of Mr. W. T. Sedgwick. The work is no ordinary biography. It is a careful and most interesting account of a conspicuously useful and honored life, but it is more, as well. It is largely a story of the progress of science during the middle part of the closing century, and it must have a potent influence over the young in impressing the dignity and the high credit of a career devoted to pure scholarship, and in enforcing the vital fact that the devotees of pure science are not on that account cut off from practical usefulness and manhood but rather qualified to do broader and better work.

Professor Rogers was a Philadelphian by birth, but spent a large part of his life in Virginia, where he was connected first with William and Mary College and later with the University of Virginia. During his Virginian life he served as the director of the geological survey of the State and was a pioneer in work of that sort. About 1853 he removed to Boston and became much interested in the project of establishing such a school of science as the Institute of Technology. No one else labored more zealously for that end, and his services in connection with it as well as his distinguished qualifications to guide it were recognized by his appointment as its first president. Here his career was as useful and distinguished as previously, until his assiduous labors broke down his health and caused his retirement for some years, but he subsequently resumed the presidency for several years more. It is a striking feature of his history that he died in the very act of presenting the diplomas to the graduating class at the Commencement of 1882, passing away thus, as he doubtless would have chosen, in the actual service of the institution which was so near his heart.

Space forbids any extended mention of his services to the world. Suffice it to say that he was famous not only in our own land but wherever such attainments as his are recognized, notably in England. Honors of all sorts fell to him and he was one of those who have the right to feel that they have made many original contributions to human knowledge, many actual discoveries. One of the most modest of men, he nevertheless possessed positive and masterful characteristics so that in every sphere he was a leader and everywhere he was deferred to and beloved. One of the most striking and beautiful features of this excellent account of him is the picture which it affords of the intense affection and the loyal and brilliantly fruitful co-operation of Professor Rogers and his three brothers. Two at least of the three were almost as distinguished scientists as himself, and they were more closely identified in researches and in the utilization of knowledge than any other family group of scientists known to us. Another interesting fact which the book makes plain is his unfailing and outspoken patriotism during the War of the Rebellion. The work is handsomely printed, is illustrated and abounds in interesting allusions to Professor Rogers's acquaintances both here and in Europe. It will be conceded a place as a standard biographical work. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $4.00.]

THE FIVE GREAT SKEPTICAL DRAMAS OF HISTORY

This is a volume by the late John Owen. Apparently its purpose is to vindicate the dignity and value of skeptical free thought. The author claims that the greatest thinkers have been skeptics, and that all dramas which have most impressed themselves on the human mind have been those whose subjects and characters pertained to skeptical free thought. The five dramas which he analyzes and discusses are the Prometheus Unbound of Æschylus, the Book of Job, Shakespeare's Hamlet, Goethe's Faust and the El Magico Prodigioso of Calderon. These he regards as the five most famous dramas in literature, and as those which manifest most conspicuously the intellectual and spiritual idiosyncrasies of their writers. They prove, he urges, that the problems and difficulties with which men have been obliged to cope through all time are substantially the same, and that they represent humanity as standing in array against the dread powers of the invisible—a contest originating with the growth of reason and inevitably destined to endure throughout eternity.

Mr. Owen certainly has done a literary work of striking interest and value in his successive analyses and interpretations of these five great dramas. But impartial readers will be likely to dispute the conclusions which he has thought himself to have reached. That is to say, it is by no means so evident that skeptical free thought can be justified from these sources. It is especially true that the book of Job, fairly interpreted, fails to harmonize with the theory of the author. His interpretation of it, while interesting, as we have said, is forced and characterized by some significant omissions, or at the least by conceptions of its meaning which are too far fetched to be acceptable. The author slurs over some portions of the book which do not fall in with his views with a readiness which his critical sense should have forbidden. Whether the drama of Calderon can be fairly ranked, in respect to fame and influence, with the others is a question, but the book is one which skeptics like the writer will be apt to value more highly than it deserves, while others, finding themselves unable to agree with its underlying teachings, may fail to do justice to the real ability which the author has exhibited in what to him were subordinate directions, yet which really are of importance. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.00.]

ANCIENT IDEALS

This is a handsome and elaborate work in two volumes, by Mr. H. O. Taylor. It is a study of intellectual and spiritual growth from early times to the establishment of Christianity. It is not a light task which the author has undertaken, but he has acquitted himself creditably. He has supplied his readers with a series of thorough, discriminating, judicious and enlightening studies of the intellectual and moral systems of the different nations. Beginning with Egypt, Chaldea and China, he then takes up India, Persia, Greece and Rome, and concludes with a specially careful study of the Jewish people and of the development of Christianity. The Greek, Roman and Jewish systems receive the most elaborate treatment, but he has discussed others with sufficient attention to detail.

The special value of the book is in the analysis which it presents of different religions, for example, Buddhism. The manner in which the Greek ideals and the genius of Rome found expression in literature and art and the influences which they exerted upon the religious beliefs of their respective nations are outlined instructively, and the story of the development of Judaism, intellectual and spiritual, and of Christianity is specially significant. The gradual but steady progress of human thought towards a higher standard and a nobler conception of the nature of spirituality, culminating in Christianity, which itself culminates in love, is not only striking but spiritually stimulating and helpful.

Some of the author's positions here or there may be disputed, but we do not see how the general course of his work can be received otherwise than with approval. The subject is discussed from the intellectual rather than from the spiritual point of view, yet this sometimes gives to its spiritual suggestions the greater emphasis. Such a bird's-eye view, so to speak, of the history of the moral development of mankind is not only useful for purposes of reference and study, but it also affords a systematized body of information which in substance is absorbed and becomes a part of the mental and spiritual furnishing of the reader to an exceptional degree. Of course, such a work is not likely to be read by the miscellaneous public, but the many who are sufficiently thoughtful and enlightened to apreciate spiritual truth will recognize its great value. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.00.]

RISE AND GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH NATION

This work, by W. H. S. Aubrey, LL. D., is, we believe, a revision and enlargement of an earlier work by him. It aims to be a popular history of English civilization and politics, rather than a critical, scientific work in the modern style. Yet the author has endeavored to do conscientious work and to bestow as patient labor upon the book as if it were intended purely for scholars. But in writing he seems to have thought chiefly of what is so often called the average reader. The result is a pleasant narrative, which affords a good general view of English history and is entertaining throughout. The movement of the story is spirited and the impressions which are made are clear and abiding.

The point of view of the book is somewhat different from that of any other which we recall, and its spirit is candid and impartial. The author sympathizes, apparently, with the Nonconformists, and, if we mistake not, is himself one of their number. Consequently, in some passages his tone is unlike that of most English historians, who, as a rule, have been in greater sympathy with the Established Church than with any other. We notice, however, nothing which can be called unfairness or even discourtesy on his part. It is simply that he looks at matters from a different angle.

The chief criticism to be made upon the three volumes is that they reveal an occasional lack of proportion. That is to say important events, such as the granting of the Magna Charta, for example, the Wars of the Roses, or the fall of Cardinal Wolsey, are described with a brevity which seems disproportionate, in spite of the mass of material which had to be condensed into three not over large volumes. If the salient features had been given greater prominence, even at the cost of some omissions, the work would have ministered more successfully to the reader's needs as well as desires, and would have escaped leaving an impression of almost monotony. This is especially noticeable in view of the fact that when the author occasionally does enlarge it may be upon occurrences which, however interesting in themselves, such as the early Pilgrim history in America, are not directly vital features of English history.

But for a popular work, intended chiefly to give ordinary readers a clear and faithful general idea of the course of English affairs, this will answer very well. There are small inaccuracies here or there, but not many of serious importance. And while the work hardly is to be compared with such others as Green's Short History of the English People, which is equally readable and at the same time far more scholarly, it may fill a place of its own usefully, and may take the first rank in the choice of some. [D. Appleton & Co. $4 50].

RELIGIOUS

Immortality and the New Theodicy [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.00] is a new work by Dr. G. A. Gordon of this city. It is the first utterance upon the Ingersoll lectureship at Harvard University. The question of the immortality of man is always peculiarly attractive to Dr. Gordon, and is considered here from a purely rational basis. The author's purpose wholly excludes any argument from Scripture. The subject is examined in the light afforded by the moral conception of the universe. The discussion is profoundly philosophical, and not more polemical than the author's point of view makes inevitable. The course of thought is ably planned and is worked out with great care, and with the frankest and fullest purpose to apprehend truth and interpret it. The argument for immortality which is presented ought to make a strong impression upon many minds which, for one or another reason, shrink from accepting evidences which to the Christian seem to be conclusive in themselves; for example, that furnished by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. The author, however, has gone too far at one or two points, assuming as essential what is not vital to his argument. If we understand him, he clearly avows belief in the doctrine of a continued probation, and also the distinction which he makes between his position and that of the Universalists, although ingenious, is hardly sufficient. The protest which he enters against the identification of his view with the doctrine of universal salvation should be heeded, in fairness to him, but practically the distinction between them does not seem to involve an essential difference. The style of the book is remarkably fine and its spirit is as beautiful as it is exalted. Even those who are opposed to the positions of the author will be stimulated to reflection in defense of their own opinions, and the volume illustrates the true temper in which theological discussions should proceed.

The erudite Prof. Edmond Stapfer of the faculty of Protestant theology at Paris has rendered a valuable service in his book, Jesus Christ Before His Ministry [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25], which Mrs. Louise S. Houghton has translated. In less than 200 pages he has put before us the conditions in the midst of which Jesus grew up. In order to do this graphically and accurately, Dr. Stapfer has not only saturated himself in the Jewish literature of the era in which Christ was born, but has made a fresh and painstaking study of the four gospels, bringing out points which seem to have escaped many of the most thorough gleaners in the same field. The childhood and youth of Jesus, his studies and reading, his relation to the Essenes, the Pharisees and to John the Baptist, and the growth in him of the Messianic consciousness are beautifully depicted. There is very little of that excessive use of the imagination and of the influence of preconceived notions which might easily mar a book of this order. It will be helpful to the increasing number of persons desirous of knowing better the historic Christ. The announcement that it is to be followed by two other small volumes, dealing respectively with the ministry of Christ and with his death and resurrection, raises keen anticipations.

In Dr. F. A. Noble's new volume of Discourses on Philippians [F. H. Revell Co. $1.25] we have a real contribution to expository literature. The discourses are twenty-three in number, and their titles indicate the author's skill in making prominent the apostle's thought. The discourses are not mere expositions but discussions of great central truths, fortified and illustrated by subordinate statements of the inspired Word which are often overlooked in the treatment of pulpit themes. While the author makes no show of learning, no one can fail to see that every sentence and word in the epistle, both in themselves and in their setting, have been carefully considered, and that men of the first rank who have written on the epistle have been consulted and their opinions conscientiously weighed. Nevertheless, the conclusions reached and the opinions expressed are those of an independent thinker. One of the striking features is the unity of these discourses. Another is their lucidity and their practical bearing upon affairs of today. Others are felicity of illustration, aptness of quotations, especially from the poets, an attractive literary style, a manly reverence in the treatment of the Scriptures, profound faith in Jesus Christ and in the work of the Holy Spirit and a confidence in the final triumph of the principles of the kingdom of God which it is a comfort to share. These discourses will increase their honored author's reputation, and will find their welcome in the homes of many of the laity as well as among ministers.

Nothing could be timelier than the appearance of the Dictionary of the Targumim, the Talmud, etc. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25], a monument of Rabbi Jastrow's patient labors. Each installment (the ninth is now before us) throws fresh light on a fresh subject—the manners and customs of the Jews in our Lord's day. What a comment, for example, on the invective upon the Pharisees, "Ye devour widows' houses," to find the expression, "The plague of the Pharisees has struck her," explained thus: "Her friends, under the pretext of benevolence, have deprived her of the benefit of the poor-law." Scholars will see a possible help for the exegesis of Dan. 5: 25 in the rabbinical epithet "A Maneh son of a P'ras," for a distinguished son of a less distinguished father.

STORIES

Trooper Peter Halket of Mashonaland [Roberts Bros. $1.25], by Olive Schreiner, almost might have been classed with religious works, although it is in form a story. The hero, a trooper, apparently in the service of the Chartered Company, is a man of reckless life, although by no means hard of heart. He has, or seems to have, an interview with Jesus Christ as if in the flesh, and as a consequence endeavors afterward to live up, in the simplest and most straightforward way, to convictions of duty impressed upon his mind by the vision. His new course speedily reaches its conclusion and the crudity of the theology of the story is likely to be overlooked because of the pathos and power with which it is presented. Moreover, its teaching that the great thing is to imitate Christ is true enough. The author has exposed scathingly the corruption of British rule and life in South Africa, and her book, sketchy though it is, possesses ability enough and, still more, truth enough to make a considerable stir. We shall watch with interest to see what reception it has in Great Britain itself. It is a devoutly religious book although nominally a story of South African frontier life.

A Minion of the Moon [New Amsterdam Book Co. $1 25] by T. W. Speight, takes the reader back to the days when highwaymen were common in England at about the beginning of the present century. It is a story of exciting adventure, sometimes eminently unlawful, but sugared for the reader with a coating of alleged high moral purpose, viz., the effort to right great wrongs, or at least the endeavor to benefit the poor at the expense of the rich. It is about as improbable as it well can be, but is well written and exciting, and we do not suppose that in present social conditions the reader is likely to be led astray by its suggestions.

A Woman in It [J. B. Lippincott Co. 50 cents] is by Rita. It is a sensational story with many grave faults and yet not without a certain clearly defined purpose to exalt what is noble. It describes the career of an adventuress but one for whom few readers will be wholly without sympathy.——Fellow Travelers [D. Appleton & Co. 50 cents] by Graham Travers, also deals with the eminently unconventional, although it is unobjectionable. But it is not a very pleasant story. The heroine's character is vigorously portrayed and she deserves the respect which the reader learns to feel for her.

MISCELLANEOUS

A new book of observations about America, by a foreigner, is America and the Americans [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25], by an anonymous Frenchman, who has visited this country two or three times and apparently has had some connection with the diplomatic service. It is bright, amusing, good-natured, but severely critical in the adverse sense, and in many respects fairly suggestive. The chief comment to be made upon it is that the author never has seen America. He has associated with Americans, it is true, but the America with which he has become acquainted is not the America which most of us know. His observations have been chiefly confined to the wealthier society of New York city, Newport and elsewhere, and he has seen little or nothing of the country at large or of the great mass of its people, in spite of some railway journeys which have tended a little to open his eyes. The thousands of well-to-do, thoughtful, high minded men and women who so largely make up the body of the population of the United States and who really control its affairs in a large measure, and who, more than any other class, are representative Americans, have remained almost wholly outside the range of his observations. He is not to blame for being unaware of this and, indeed, he has seemed to suspect it at times and has guarded his utterances. But the type of American from which he has generalized, although a real type, is not the prevailing, characteristic type, so that foreigners reading his book are sure to be misled in important respects. That he has criticised frankly and sometimes severely many things which he has noticed is no more than is fair, though, as he apparently was informed, on one or two occasions the occurrences which happened to come under his eye were conspicuously unusual instead of being characteristic. The book is rather tiresome, in spite of a certain vivacity, but it may not prove tiresome to people who are themselves imperfectly familiar with America and Americans.

Two years ago Dr. James Baldwin prepared a valuable volume entitled A Guide to Systematic Reading in the Encyclopædia Britannica [Werner Co. $2.00]. Five new volumes of supplementary matter to the Encyclopædia Britannica have appeared since then and the work before us is a revision and enlargement of Dr. Baldwin's original volume. The welcome accorded its first edition has encouraged the compiler to add twelve new chapters besides many hundreds of new references. The early work has been largely rewritten and rearranged and the briefest examination of the volume is sufficient to convince one of its large and lasting value. At first thought one hardly would think of systematic reading in connection with such a work as the Encyclopædia Britannica, which ordinarily is looked upon as intended merely for purposes of reference. But it is quite possible to combine those portions of it which relate to the same general theme into a group of readings, not only the more instructive because of their association but also of large additional interest and value. The chapters in this volume include suggestions for courses of reading, general as well as special, for readings in connection with different branches of study, for others throwing light on all sorts of miscellaneous subjects, such as the farmer, the seaman, the political economist, the magistrate and even the policeman. And there are chapters on games, sports and pastimes, on readings for Bible students, and the numerous candidates for the civil service will find their wants carefully provided for. The volume, of course, opens the doors to an immense amount of information, much of which is recondite and likely to be otherwise overlooked except by special students. It is well arranged, handsomely printed and carefully indexed and is a valuable addition to any library.

Pennsylvania, Colony and Commonwealth [H. T. Coates & Co. $1.50] is by S. G. Fisher and is a sequel to his early volume, The Making of Pennsylvania. It takes up the story at the period after the State may be said to have been settled, when Penn came into power, and it brings the narrative down to the close of the Revolution. There are also supplementary chapters on the Whisky Rebellion, the Hot Water Rebellion, the Civil War and the Pre-eminence of Philadelphia, the author regarding these as topics worthy of treatment, but feeling that the history of the State as a whole, subsequent to the Revolution, cannot yet be written effectively. His style is popular and his narrative enjoyable. Many may hesitate, here and there, to accept his positions, and his effort to exalt the Quakers at the expense of other colonists in regard to the treatment of the Indians is a decided failure. He succeeds in showing that the Indians were not always well treated in Pennsylvania, and also has to concede practically that others treated them about as well as the Pennsylvanians did, which is true. The book, as a whole, however, serves a useful purpose creditably.

Mr. F. W. Williams has reproduced, under the title A History of China [Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.00], the historical chapters from the well-known work by his father, the late Dr. S. Wells Williams, called The Middle Kingdom. To these he has added a chapter summarizing the more important occurrences in connection with Chinese history during the dozen years since The Middle Kingdom was last revised. No attempt has been made to revise the preceding chapters of the book, but they need comparatively little work in that line, for of all countries China has changed the least. In the chapter of which he is also the author the editor has described with good success the development of French interest in Indo-China and the war between China and Japan. His sympathies in connection with the latter event lie strongly with China, and he claims, with more earnestness than most Occidental writers have displayed, that Japan was substantially the aggressor. It is well to have this side of the argument brought out whether it be finally accepted by historians or not. The merits of the work are too well known to need special mention and its timeliness is apparent. The closing chapter supplements its predecessors advantageously and the book is issued handsomely.

NOTES

—— In Japan, last year, 26,965 books were published. Of these 20,000 were compilations.

—— A copy of the first edition of Izaac Walton's Compleat Angler was sold recently in London for $1,660.

—— It is a noteworthy fact that under its present management the circulation of the Bibliotheca Sacra has doubled.

—— Lord Roberts's new book, Forty-one Years in India, ran through eight editions in hardly more than as many days.

—— Paul du Chaillu, the eminent traveler, explorer, author and lecturer, is mentioned prominently for the post of United States minister to Sweden and Norway. He would be welcomed cordially in those countries.

—— The two works by Mr. W. D. Howells which are most hard to be obtained now are Poems of Two Friends and Niagara Revisited. The former was his earliest book.

—— Some idea of the immense demand for the Bible may be gained from the statement that of the Oxford Bible—a handsome and comparatively costly edition—500,000 copies were sold in 1875, 700,000 in 1885, and 1,000,000 in 1895.

—— The library of the American Bible Society has been added to the Lenox Library in New York city, although only in trust. The latter already included one of the finest Biblical libraries in existence, and the addition of this remarkable collection of some 6,000 volumes and manuscripts will be appreciated generally.

—— The proposal to erect a statue of the late Harriet Beecher Stowe in the Capitol grounds at Hartford has caused considerable excitement at Hartford. Its projectors appear to be self-appointed and unauthorized so far as they are known at all, and the immediate family of Mrs. Stowe oppose the scheme earnestly. They very properly suggest that people who wish to honor her memory would be wiser to found a scholarship in her name at Hampton or elsewhere.

Honors Where Honors are Due

The actual presence of Hon. Neal Dow seemed to be the only lack at the magnificent celebration of his ninety-third birthday last Thursday in Tremont Temple. A banquet, provided by the Massachusetts Prohibition State Committee, was enjoyed by about 500 persons, and enthusiasm ran high around the great hall bedecked with banners, flags and bunting. Above the platform, in a group of the likenesses of temperance leaders, was conspicuous the genial countenance of "our grand old man," and a printed statement from his own hand was before every banqueter. Hon. Wolcott Hamlin, presiding, made the opening remarks. Then Rev. E. D. Burr, D. D., of Ruggles Street Church told of the attitude of the church toward the prohibition evangelist. Mrs. Susan Fessenden of the W. C. T. U. spoke of the victory to be won over another slavery. Lieutenant-Colonel Cozens of the Salvation Army represented "the largest temperance society in the world," in whose service he acted; and among a number of other speakers Mr. Henry H. Faxon gave a brief address, comparing theoretical and practical workings of present day organizations. The address of the evening was by Mr. J. G. Woolley on The Life Work of Neal Dow. His words were a glowing tribute to the "champion of little children, the knightly friend of woman, the incorruptible politician, the honest, brave and noble gentleman, Neal Dow! Salute him, about to live forever! When he saw the right he hailed it, and while the whole world of politics has been on its knees to expediency he has stood for righteousness, without a sop of any kind, and well nigh without a sign of cheer for sixty years or more, unswerving and unswervable."

Appreciation of the Fine Arts

The decrease in the number of total visitors to the Museum of Fine Arts last year is much to be regretted, and is larger than it should be, but it is logically accounted for by the president and his committee in the smaller number of special exhibitions held during the directors' absence abroad, and by the more general use of bicycles for outdoor recreation. In all nearly 200,000 admissions were recorded, by far the greater number being on free days, and over 17,700 by entrance fee. The Sunday visitors averaged 1,543, those on Saturday, the only free week day, 1,010.

The expense of carrying on the institution last year was $41,491, which with the cost of furnishings makes a total of $43,351. The income was $41,420, leaving a deficit of over $1,900, which is about $3,500 less than the deficiency of the preceding year. The amounts received from annual subscribers show an increase over that of 1895, an encouraging fact, since their falling off to any large extent would imperil the existence of the museum. "Such an institution," says the committee, "must necessarily be a growth and not a creation, and the measure of its growth must be the value which shall be placed upon it by those persons whose public spirit prompts them to do their part towards leaving the world a little better than they found it." The museum has never received, nor does it look for any aid from city or State. A continuance and increase, therefore, of voluntary gifts is desired.

Whatever of lecturing and classwork has been undertaken has gone far to prove the necessity of an addition to the main building which shall contain a convenient audience hall. Constant demand for more extended apartments for comprehensive courses of instruction have added to the necessities for such accommodations. Moreover, the crowded condition of the museum forbids the enlargement of the present collections with the exhibits which are multiplying in the basement. May not the memory of the lately deceased associates of the leading spirits—General Walker, Henry L Pierce, George W. Wales, William G. Russell, and earlier, Martin Brimmer—foster a longing for the education here put at the disposal of the public, and inspire a resolve to enlarge the means of satisfying the longing in others.

Ministers' Meeting

Rev. Dr. D. L. Furber read a scholarly paper upon John Eliot, a subject with which he has become especially familiar and upon which he spoke in connection with the anniversary exercises in honor of the great apostle to the Indians that took place at Newton last autumn. At the close of his paper Professor Ropes of Harvard Divinity School spoke with regard to the movement with reference to the charitable and reform institutions of the State. Mr. Ropes, in connection with other public-spirited men and women, is doing all in his power to bring the influences of the churches and the ministers to bear at the State House. The resolution which he presented and which was unanimously adopted was as follows:

Resolved, That the plan proposed by the Commission on the Charitable and Reformatory Institutions of the Commonwealth for separating the care of the State charities from that of the insane, for creating a department for children, and for taking all penal institutions under control of the State, meets with the hearty approval of the Boston Congregational Ministers' Meeting.

After the regular exercises the complimentary tickets to the Zoo were distributed and found a ready market. The brethren apparently relished the idea of devoting a part of Monday to this highly educational outing, and strolled off in groups of twos and threes to cultivate the acquaintance of the orang-outang, as well as to inspect the other treasures of that remarkable collection of animals.

The Subway Nearing Completion

It will be good news to the thousands who travel daily through Tremont and Boylston Streets that so large a portion of the subway is so nearly finished as to justify the hope that the electric cars will be running through it by midsummer. No one can appreciate the magnitude of this engineering feat who has not explored the subterranean passages which by this time have become a veritable underground world. It is well worth the hour or more required for a hasty visit to gain a realization of what the human brain plus modern mechanical devices can accomplish.

Once within the subway, brilliantly lighted, spacious, substantially finished with the most durable and handsome materials, one has nothing of the grewsome feeling which associates itself with a gloomy tunnel. The portions most nearly completed take on some of the attractions of a promenade. Throughout the entire distance of a mile and one-third there is ample room for two tracks, and in some parts the subway is broadened to accommodate four tracks and several platforms. Visitors are now confined to the section between the Public Gardens or the junction of Shawmut and Tremont Sreets on one hand and Park Street Church on the other. To avoid grade crossings a sub-subway has been constructed at the corner of Tremont and Boylston Streets, near the spot of the awful explosion of three weeks ago. The explosion, however, it should be remembered, was not due to the subway, but to the action of the gases which had collected between the top of the subway and the ground.

The first work on the subway was done in March, 1895. Since then there have been at times as many as a thousand men at work simultaneously. The greatness of the feat accomplished is all the more apparent in view of the fact that travel has been obstructed to so remarkably small an extent. If the subway shall prove a success in the way of forwarding rapid transit—and there seems to be every indication now that it will, inasmuch as it is expected that only eight minutes will be required for a car to go from the Union Station to the Providence Station, it is not at all improbable that another great highway of the city, like Washington Street, will be similarly treated. At any rate, when the work already under way is entirely finished, Boston will have an underground artery of travel which for extent, strength and beauty of finish and successful mastery of great difficulties encountered in construction will surpass anything of its kind in the world.

A Notable Meeting of the Congregational Club

Seats were almost at a premium last Monday evening in Lorimer Hall, and there was quite a sprinkling of women in the galleries. Evidently the announcements for the evening had a drawing power. It was indeed an uncommonly rich program. On President Barton's right sat the scholarly Professor Fisher of Yale and Professor Moore of Andover. On the president's left were the representative of Bangor, Professor Beckwith, once a highly esteemed member of Boston ministerial circles, and the spokesman for Hartford, Professor Walker, whose brilliant work in history has given him a reputation quite unusual for a man of his years. This quartet of able and bright men succeeded in putting their hearers in touch with life within theological seminary walls.

After the club had heartily indorsed a resolution, brought forward by Hon. A. H. Wellman, commending the movement now going forward in Medford to do away with the gambling abuses at the trotting parks in that city, Professor Fisher spoke of the character of present day theological studies. The seminary is a microcosm exhibiting the characteristics of the thinking world at large. Today, as contrasted with the past, less emphasis is placed on the department of systematic theology, while interest centers about the origin and genesis of faith, of man, of sin, of the Scriptures and even of the person of Christ. The doctrine of evolution the speaker thought could be held along with faith in the supernatural and with a belief in a primal, willful transgression of man. There is still room for the gospel, and Dr. Fisher laid great stress upon its being the vital and most interesting thing which the church has to offer men.

Professor Walker answered the question, Are Our Seminaries Maintaining the Quality of the Ministry? first in the negative. He compared the number of thoroughly trained men in the New England ministry a century and a quarter ago with the proportion today, which is much less. On the other hand, the seminaries continue to hold up a high intellectual standard to which many men conform, and which serves as a stimulus in many directions. Dr. Walker deprecated the preference by some churches of oratorical talent to thorough training, and he repelled the idea that the seminaries are remote from the churches.

Professor Beckwith's topic was What Does the Seminary Mean to Stand for in Relation to the Churches? He set forth the ideals which to a certain extent are realized. These include a broad intellectual training, the inculcation of the right intellectual spirit, sympathy with the churches and a practical bent which make the men useful.

The last speaker, Professor Moore, set forth the service which the seminary renders the churches by maintaining an intellectual center. This function the speaker regarded as one of the most important duties of a seminary. Thereby sound learning is preserved and advanced, men in the active ministry are guided in their studies, books are written and the line of scholars maintained. Confidence and loyalty should mark the mutual relations of the churches and the seminaries.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS

It is not at all unusual for us to hear of a good number of accessions from a single S. S. class. Such facts should not discourage teachers whose efforts are not thus rewarded. On the other hand, their hopefulness should be stimulated by the thought that in their classes as well one scholar deciding aright may encourage others. Nor should a discouraging comparison of one's efforts with others' work be made under such circumstances, since some classes are stony ground, while fertile spots may be adjacent.

Time and effort judiciously spent in house to house visitation is never lost, as doubtless that Western city church will find. In these days of multiplying social organizations it is easy to lose sight of the personal element, which in Christian work is most permanently effective.

A large increase in an Indiana church collection for a specific object was due in a great measure to a deacon's personal effort. The givers seemed to forget hard times.

A church in New Jersey which at the very outset cut out certain money-raising features common in some places states its entire satisfaction and success with its method.

An Oregon item suggests how many ways of doing good a trained and consecrated worker may find, even when, as in this case, he is a semi-invalid.

A novel plan for the systematic raising of funds for the benevolent work of the denomination during the next half-decade comes from St. Louis.

The strength of New York State Congregationalism is accounted for in a good degree by such experienced constituents as a few mentioned this week.

An important and, doubtless, helpful decision has been made by a Connecticut Sunday school.

Southern Illinois towns have seldom had such an evangelistic arousing as of late.

AN INSTITUTIONAL ENTERPRISE IN WASHINGTON

When the Army of the Potomac was mustered here in 1865, the vast number of refugees were left stranded, like a terminal moraine, when the glacier which carried it has melted. One of the first missionary efforts for the disorganized camp followers was the Lincoln Mission, started in an old barrack building. The effort has grown into a number of strong churches, among the most prominent being Lincoln Congregational Church. When this church was organized, in 1881, many of the faithful workers, finding their efforts no longer needed there, started a new enterprise near Howard University, called the University Park Mission. Some of the workers in this latter mission were the children of the young workers of the old Lincoln Mission. The new mission has now in turn grown into a church, which is called the University Park Temple Congregational Church, and was recognized by the Washington Conference last week. The Temple Church is one of the first, and may be the only institutional church, among the colored people. Its membership is largely made up of the more influential colored people of Washington, including such men as Hon. B. K. Bruce, John M. Langston, Robert W. Terrell and others, who have banded themselves together to help their less fortunate neighbors, of whom there are about 3,000 in the neighborhood.

At present two kindergartens are held in the church building, one in the morning, free, the other in the afternoon, with a small charge of fifty cents per month. Three clubs are organized—one for girls divided into four classes of King's Daughters, one for small and one for large boys; also a mothers' meeting, a kitchen garden, or training school for servants, and a boys' brigade, besides a Sunday school and the other usual church exercises. It is planned to start a reading-room, savings bank and other lines of institutional work as soon as possible.

The enterprise is under the management of Rev. S. N. Brown, who has been pastor of the Plymouth Church, and is a professor in the theological department of Howard University. He has the confidence of the mission workers, who have agreed to turn the property over to the church as soon as it becomes thoroughly established.

This forward movement among the colored people will be watched with interest by their many friends throughout the country, for if it is entirely successful it will refute the charge so often made that colored people have little loyalty to their own race, and, while ever willing to receive, are but slow to give to their less fortunate neighbors. THE GOSPEL IN LECTURES

The churches of Elgin, Ill., have recently given a hearing to the lectures on The Nazarine, by Rev. J. B. Koehne, who was personally a stranger in the community, but reports of whose work elsewhere had awakened expectation. It was known that he had relinquished the pulpit of the First Congregational Church, Sacramento, to give himself to this wider ministry, and that the course had uniformly been received with marked approval. In this case, however, the results outran all expectation. The large audience-room could not contain all who sought admittance, while the impression made upon the community was profound.

His purpose in this series of six lectures is to set forth the essential reasonableness of Christianity, but the argument by which he supports the faith of Jesus moves in the realm of indisputable fact. His chosen method is to present Christianity in its historic relations, and to demonstrate its fitness not only to supplement the obvious weaknesses and deficiencies of other religious systems of the world, but to satisfy the needs of souls bowed down under the weight of conscious sin.

To this task he brings a rare equipment. He is an altogether unique personality. His conceptions of Christianity are broad and thoroughly evangelical, his grasp of the details of history firm and strong, and his gifts of utterance command and hold the attention. His habitual manner of speech is quiet but intense. His literary style is clear, vivid and sometimes poetic, and that he is a thorough scholar becomes increasingly evident. Flashes of wit, keen but kindly, illumine the sober consideration of great historic verities. He speaks of ages remote from our time, but his audiences are not suffered to forget the bearing of the principles under consideration on the vital problems of today. In a word, the message he brings cannot fail to profit every listener, dispelling doubts, enriching faith and rousing to higher endeavor.

Hyde followed with Does the Preaching of Today Stimulate Piety and Religion. At the afternoon session Rev. F. W. Whitlock discussed The Problem of the Unchurched. Mrs. Jeffery, formerly a missionary, entertained the association with A Half-hour in India, and other missionary talks followed. In the evening Rev. C. H. Percival gave an address on The Duty of Congregationalism in Present Problems. Participation in the discussions was quite general.

Newton's two representatives in the legislature, Messrs. A. F. Hayward and E. L. Pickard, both members of the club, also took part in the discussion. NEW ENGLAND

Park Street. Last week the church and society concurred with each other in regard to the resignation recently offered by the pastor, Rev. I. J. Lansing. The acceptance of the resignation was voted in both cases and committees were appointed to arrange for a council. Last Sunday Rev. D. W. Waldron preached on Eighty Years of City Mission Work, and a collection of over $1,000 was taken for that object. This is the 25th year of Mr. Waldron's connection with the Missionary Society, of which he is the secretary.

Shawmut. For several weeks Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., has been conducting a class in The Neglected Books of Scripture. A study of Revelation has overcrowded the room and compelled adjournment to a larger one, where the attendance has numbered 160. The lectures are repeated at the Berkeley Temple Institute.

Garrison Memorial held no services last Sunday, since at a previous meeting it had been decided to consult with a council soon to be called as to the future of the organization. The work has not been supported strongly enough, and the pastor, Rev. Peter Stanford, will return to England in the fall.

The late Rev. Luther Farnham left about $15,000 for religious and charitable objects. Among the bequests were $2,000 each to the C. H. M. S., the American S. S. Union and the American Bible Society, and $1,000, and such books as are not needed by relatives, to the General Theological Library of this city.

Massachusetts

A.——Central. The missionary concerts during the year deal with topics grouped under the general head, Historic Missionary Movements, and a printed program of the series is issued. For a single meeting three speakers are chosen long in advance to prepare papers on given topics, while fresh news from the whole field is reported during the last part of the hour.

Needham.—First, Rev. A. S. Walker, D. D, pastor, has just completed a series of 12 illustrated Sunday evening lectures on Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. The interest has continued unabated with the large audiences throughout. The course has been of great profit to both old and young.

Norwood.—The pastor, Rev. C. F. Weeden, has arranged a series of special preaching services for successive Friday evenings. D., Rev. E. C. Moore, D. D., Rev. H. A. Bridgman, Rev. Judson Smith, D. D., Prof. Rush Rhees and Rev. W. H. Allbright. Special music has proved an added attraction.

Services were held twice a day for three weeks, with large congregations, the last numbering 1,400. Newburyport.—Prospect St. The annual parish meeting was the occasion for much rejoicing over the excellent condition of the church finances, which warranted the addition of $100 to the salary of the pastor, Rev. M. O. Patton. He has delivered a lecture on a trip through the Evangeline country, by which a good sum was added to the piano fund. ——Whitefield. Rev. J. H. Reid, the pastor, is about to leave Edinburgh, Scotland, where he has been hearing lectures and studying since Jan. 1, and will now take a course at Mansfield College, Oxford. Mrs. Reid will join him soon for the summer. Rev. C. S. Brooks is giving excellent satisfaction as his substitute in pulpit and parish.

Torrey, recently acted as moderator of the town meeting. The Parish Bulletin stands for righteousness on all public issues, and gives its opinion on all local topics, with no slight influence in the community The printing office, established by the pastor, has become an independent, useful and influential plant. New horse-sheds have been built about the church, and the vestry is newly equipped and enlarged. Everything suggests a prosperous and model country church.

Sidney Crawford on the subject What Ought a Church to Do with Its Delinquent Members.——Pilgrim made an offering for the City Missionary Society recently of $200, which was increased to $250 by a special contribution. A number of young people have become Christians during the winter. The pastor, Rev. A. B. Bassett, is on a trip abroad for a number of months, and Rev. A. J. Dyer, formerly of North Brookfield, is supplying the pulpit.

Dudley.—First. A reception was tendered the pastor, Rev. W. E. Morse, by the parish and Y. P. S. C. E. after his return from his vacation. A purse of money was presented him as a token of esteem. The church is deeply mourning the loss of Albert Jacobs, senior deacon, who held the office 30 years.

Special exercises were held at the opening of the session.——Park. A boy choir assisted at the morning service last Sunday.——Eastern Avenue. In observance of the birthday of Neal Dow a temperance service was held at the church last week. The interest proved so intense as to require a continuation at the next meeting. The organization of a temperance society is proposed. ——St. John's. The members have been observing a season of self denial for the benefit of the church, and this week a social was held for those who have participated in the work.——The little church at Brightwood, Union Evangelical, has just closed a most successful season of revival which lasted five weeks. Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Barrett, evangelists of New York, have assisted, and last Sunday the largest number of persons ever received at one time was admitted to membership. The pastor, Rev. L. E. Bell, has a call to a large Methodist church, but it is understood that if the present plans of enlargment are carried out he will remain here.

Maine

Houlton has made remarkable progress during the less than three years pastorate of Rev. H. L. McCann. The church was then receiving $400 from the Maine Missionary Society. It has assumed self-support from March 1, giving the pastor $1,000 salary. A parsonage has been purchased, 44 new members have joined the church, 26 since this year began. These were entertained recently at a reception give in their honor.

Hiram and Sebago.—Two young men, graduates of Mt. Hermon School, have ministered here, Mr. Willis P. Hume succeeding Mr. G. P. Merrett. Both have worked successfully for the spiritual interests of these small churches and there is steady growth. The C. E. Societies are doing active work.

Bangor.—The Central Club course of lectures, which has been arranged by Rev. G. W. Field, D. D., annually for the past 15 years, has just closed after a season of much interest. Dr. Field announced that this would probably be the last effort of the kind.

Ellsworth.—A unique celebration by the church was on the 77th birthday of the statehood of Maine. Speeches were made on Maine, Her Past, Present, Future, Her Statesmen, Literary and Musical Work, etc. A fine collation was provided.

Portland.—State Street. Dr. J. L. Jenkins sails with his wife next month for a three months' absence. The church has recently sustained deep loss in the death of two of its deacons.——Williston has voted not to accept the resignation of its pastor, Rev. D. M. Pratt.

Deer Isle.—Rev. S. A. Apraham will give two lectures here on Armenia and her sufferings, and Bangor, Bath, Thomaston and other places have been or will be visited.

New Hampshire

Derry.—During the past winter there has been an unusual religious interest among the students of Pinkerton Academy, nearly 20 per cent. of the total membership professing to have begun the Christian life. The church and community have sustained a great loss in the death of Dea. G. W. Barker, who has always been a zealous promoter of every good work looking to the moral and spiritual welfare of the town.

Brentwood is enjoying a season of spiritual prosperity as the result of faithful pastoral work. The attendance at services has increased, and some have been led to begin a Christian life. A new organ has been put into the meeting house. The pastor, Rev. H. H. Colburn, has recently been remembered by his appreciative people with a generous gift of money.

Tamworth.—The late Deacon Faxon Gannett left $400 to the church, which he served many years, and $200 each to the H. M. S. and the A. B. C. F. M., and, after a few personal gifts, the residue is to be divided equally between these two societies and the church. He was almost 90 years old. His wife survived him but six hours.

New Ipswich.—The parsonage has been greatly improved by a fresh coat of paint and other needed repairs at an expense of $200. The general interest is shown in the doubling of the usual Sunday morning winter attendance, an increase of S. S. membership, and the organization of a home department.

Hopkinton has recently held a series of union revival services for two weeks, Rev. E. A. Whittier assisting. A score or more professing conversion resulted, among them being one or two men who have led intemperate lives. Christians are greatly encouraged and larger results are expected.

Lancaster.—As the first fruits of the union evangelistic services under the lead of Rev. Ralph Gillam, at the last communion 65 new members were received to the church, 62 on confession. Others are expected to follow in the near future.

Rindge.—The oldest member of the church, Mrs. Malina Stickney, recently celebrated pleasantly her 95th birthday. She has been for many years interested in all church work.

Wilmot.—Four young ladies from one Sunday school class were lately received on confession. A teachers' meeting is held Friday evenings. A Junior C. E. Society has recently been organized.

Hampstead.—The festivities of a recent birthday party in aid of the ladies' social circle were enjoyable. Satisfying refreshments followed. The receipts were $51.

Rhode Island

Providence.—Pilgrim. A Young Men's Club for boys over 12 years of age has been started. Weekly meetings, with parlor gymnastics, stereopticon tours of travel, local history expeditions, botany outings, chorus singing, etc., are the program. The Sunday school officers appoint the club's superintendent, and all active members must be regular attendants of the Sunday school.——Beneficent. Rev. G. M. Boynton, D. D., preached last Sunday evening.

Riverpoint.—The Endeavor Society has shipped two boxes containing clothing, reading matter, etc., valued at $90, to a Sunday school missionary in the South.

Connecticut

New Haven.—United. The Men's Club service was addressed March 14 by Professor Winchester of Wesleyan University on The Bible as Literature. The speaker last Sunday evening was President Stryker of Hamilton College.——Howard Avenue. The membership of the church the first of January was 496, with a Sunday school of 407 members. The church was first organized as a mission school in 1865. It has had five pastors, all but the present one being dead. Rev. Dr. W. J. Mutch completed the 11th year of his pastorate last December.——Fair Haven. The news of the resignation of Rev. D. M. James from the Second Church, to take effect at the close of the present year, is heard with regret by the many that know him in this city.

Hartford.—Center. Dr. B. R. Abbe died last week. For 26 years he was an active member of the church.——Fourth. Special afternoon meetings were held all last week except Saturday. Rev. H. H. Kelsey was assisted by Dr. C. M. Lamson and Professor Beardsley. The society and congregation have definitely decided not to erect a new edifice. Plans were under consideration for nearly two years, but after a thorough review of the difficulties, the hard times and the pressing needs for more room at once, it was voted last week to drop the matter and remodel the present structure. The changes will cost about $10,000, and will provide an additional seating capacity of 200.

Morris has inaugurated Sunday evening preaching services, with good attendance, and a Junior Endeavor Society has been organized under promising conditions. The pastor, Rev. C. C. Redgrave, makes frequent use of the blackboard in the services, and his special short sermons are particularly popular with the children. The church is strong spiritually.

Glastonbury.—First. A quiet but effective work is going on. Meetings were held for three weeks at the opening of the year, and a pastor's instruction class has been held each week since. Thirty-two persons united with the church last communion season, all but one on confession, and more are expected. The Sunday evening service is large and inspiring. Rev. G. F. Waters is pastor.

Clinton.—The pastor, Rev. T. A. Emerson, is giving a course of Sunday evening lectures during Lent. Some topics are: Jesus, the Carpenter, the Personal Friend, the Preacher, the Teacher, the Dying Redeemer; Jesus the Risen Lord. Union revival services have been held for four weeks, Rev. H. W. Pope assisting the pastors during two weeks. Many signified their desire to lead Christian lives.

Meriden.—First received 46 members March 7, 42 on confession. Each was given a Bible, according to custom. The attendance was the largest for years. At a teachers' meeting, at which 75 were present, the unanimous sentiment was in favor of continuing without quarterlies, using the Bible entirely in the Sunday school.

East Hampton.—A recent entertainment netted a considerable sum for a new chapel. A large audience learned of the habits and customs of the Orient, and the ceremonies of a mock marriage and trial added pleasure and instruction to the auditors. Many articles were exhibited for examination.

South Glastonbury.—The annual meeting was held March 5. After supper and business a historical paper by Mr. F. D. Glazier was read. The present pastor, Rev. F. S. Brewer, began his work in June, 1894.

Winsted.—Second. The cost of the contemplated improvements is estimated at $15,000, to be raised by subscription, the contributors being allowed five years to pay their amounts. It was recently voted to build a Sunday school room on the south side of the church provided sufficient funds are raised. This addition will cost about $5,000.

Trumbull.—The trustees were instructed, at a special meeting of the church, to compromise the settlement of the Harriet Beardsley legacy by accepting 75 cents on the dollar. The amount left by Mrs. Beardsley to the church was $1,000, but, on account of certain conditions that have arisen in the settlement of the will, this course seemed advisable.

The Ladies' Aid Society at North Coventry raised $80 at a recent birthday party.——Rev. C. E. McKinley of Rockville has been suffering from the grip, and was compelled to dismiss his congregation on a recent Sunday.——Torringford has had unusual spiritual activity, aided by the special efforts of Rev. A. H. Norris.——At a special meeting of the church at Willimantic, last week, it was voted to place the Sunday school under church control again.——Hockanum is enjoying special services of an evangelistic nature.——The Second Church, Norwich, loses, in the death of Mrs. John Dunham, a member of 72 years' standing.——Rev. Roscoe Nelson of Windsor unites with the pastor of the Methodist church in Bible meetings Tuesday and Thursday evenings of each week.

MIDDLE STATES

New York

Westmoreland.—Fourteen persons were received to membership March 7, 11 on confession. The work of the Ladies' Aid and Missionary Society is generously and faithfully supported. The young girls of the church are making progress in Christian experience and general church work. Under the name of the "Steady Seekers" they have a prayer and conference meeting each Sunday afternoon. About 18 persons have united with the Y. P. S. C. E. as active members during the past two months. The present membership is 45. Rev. C. A. Frasure is pastor.

In central New York there are at least three Congregational clergymen in active service who are striking examples of "bringing forth fruit in old age": Rev. John Cunningham, whose church has just passed through a great revival, Rev. Edward Taylor, D. D., of Binghamton, who crowds the week with from six to ten sermons, addresses and the like, and is sought far and wide by the Sunday school, Y. M. C. A., Y. P. S. C. E. and other conventions as a speaker, and whose services are most acceptable to churches over a wide extent of territory, and Rev. Samuel Johnson of New Haven, who is an efficient pastor, and is active in many good works. Two of these brethren have already passed the "three score and ten" mark.

New Jersey

Asbury Park, in the nine months of its existence, has added 41 to its original membership of 144, 16 being received March 7. Worship is conducted in a hall which seats about 500. Sunday evenings every seat is generally occupied. Prayer meetings are helpful and well supported, the attendance running above 100. A guild of 92 members looks after the lay work of the church, the 15 sections of the organization having charge of distinct parts of the parish activities. Besides the more familiar branches of church work, there are "sections" for looking after employment, savings, membership and advertising and printing. A lot has been secured in the heart of the place, and at one meeting $3,000 were subscribed towards building a house of worship. At the organization of the church it was resolved to keep to purely spiritual and philanthropic activities. No fairs or other entertainments are resorted to for raising money. The Y. P. S. C. E. is vigorous and growing.

Warrenville is gradually substituting the English for the German tongue in its services. There are now two English classes in the Sunday school, and the Sunday evening service is in English.

Jersey City.—Waverly is rejoicing because it has finally provided, with the aid of the conference, for the extinction of its mortgage. Thirty-six have been added to the membership within a year.

Guttenberg has voted to disband and has sold its building, subject to the C. C. B. S. lien, to the German Baptists.

Mound City.—Pilgrim closed a four weeks' series of meetings March 1. The church is without a pastor and Evangelist Ben Deering assisted and also neighboring pastors. During the meeting 175 persons made a public confession, 60 were baptized and 107 were received into this church. Others united with the Methodist church and Episcopal churches elsewhere. Among the converts uniting with the church were the State's attorney, the mayor of the city, other county and public officers, superintendents of factories, leading business men, husbands of wives long faithful in the church. About three-fourths of the converts were men and most of them heads of families. The town was greatly awakened and wonderfully renovated. The saloons appear desolated.

Rockefeller.—Rev. Isaac Cookman has just closed a successful two and a half years' pastorate. During that time a house of worship and parsonage have been secured and paid for and the church has become self-supporting. The citizens emphasized their expressions of good will and esteem by closing the schools and business houses and gathering in a body at the railway station when Mr. Cookman and family took their departure.

Chicago.—University. The fourth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. N. T. Rubinkam was celebrated this month. During Lent a course of Sunday morning sermons is being preached on The Family: its origin, past, present, future, inner life, and social system. The evening addresses for three months are on The Search after God, and are given by representatives from the University of Chicago.

Indiana

Hosmer.—Rev. Thomas Smith closed his work March 14. His seven years' pastorate has been blessed, the church building has been remodeled, a parsonage built and paid for, and a net gain of 90 members is recorded by the church. Services were held on several days of a farewell character. Several of the neighboring ministers participated. A collection of $20 was made for the C. H. M. S. The house was crowded at all the exercises. Mr. Smith begins his work at Washington April 1.

Orland.—Rev. J. R. Bonney has been invited to remain with the church for a fifth year. The recent annual collection for home missions was $45, a third better than last year.

The statistics for 1897 for the State show 58 churches, a gain of six, a total membership of 4,522, a gain of 186, although several churches pruned their lists strictly. Total benevolences were $4,463, a loss of $169. Home expenses were $54,332, a loss of $1,900. Total accessions were 653, C. E. members 1,547, a gain of 93. S. S. membership, 5,661, a gain of 263. Forty-six pastors and supplies serve the 58 churches. The churches added were Southside, Union and Northeast, Indianapolis; Welsh Church, Gas City; Broad Ripple and Alexandria. The four largest churches are First, Terre Haute; Plymouth, Fort Wayne; Plymouth, Indianapolis; and Michigan City, First.

Michigan

GRAND HAVEN is rejoicing in the possession of a new pipe organ, made in Boston especially for this church. At the inauguration concert the audience filled the house, and contributed an amount sufficient to clear all debt. The young people have given further cheer by forming the largest chorus in the city and engaging an instructor to drill them. The Junior Endeavorers assisted in the dedicatory services, March 14. The Sunday school is constantly growing. Rev. D. A. Richardson, the new pastor, has found time enough to spare from beginning his labors here to go to Georgia and look up the land for the Armenian colony. The land has since been purchased for that purpose.

DETROIT.—Woodward Avenue. The women have completely refurnished the Sunday school and social rooms with handsome carpet and chairs.——Mt. Hope. The Men's Auxiliary have just carried through a pleasant entertainment with a large attendance. A good sum was netted.——The Congregational Union held its regular meeting last week Monday. The matters before the meeting were preparation of completed plans for the Fort Street new church, the removal of the location of Mt. Hope Church from 25th Street to the newly opened Boulevard, two blocks west, and the calling of a council for the organization and recognition of a new church at the Boulevard chapel.

NORTH ADAMS has just celebrated its 50th anniversary with jubilee services, a neighboring pastor assisting. The church has had 16 pastors, including Rev. T. G. Baxter, who is in his first year of the pastorate.

RED JACKET.—Last year the church received 56 new members, 52 on confession. The membership is nearly 300. A balance left after all bills were paid was a cause for thankfulness.

Wisconsin

NEW RICHMOND.—The business men of the Methodist, Baptist and Congregational churches have united in sending out messages for general revival services with Rev. C. N. Hunt as leader. A large chorus under the direction of the pastor, Rev. A. D. Adams, has been organized. Mr. Hunt, the lawyer evangelist, is successful in the work.

NEW LONDON.—Plymouth. Rev. G. B. Hubbard recently celebrated his 75th year, and he is still active in the ministry. The church recently voted to invite him to remain with them as pastor to complete his 10th year of service with them and the 50th in the ministry.

THE WEST

Missouri

ST. LOUIS.—Compton Hill, through its church visitor and some of its members, is giving particular attention to visiting the families in the parish. The Sunday school is recovering from the effects of the cyclone of last year.——Immanuel. Rev. W. N. Bessey, who has been ill, is again in his place.——At the session of the Ministers' Meeting, March 15, Rev. William Johnson read a paper on Congregationalism in St. Louis, Its Strength and Its Work. He estimated that the situation calls for about $65,000 during the next five years, and suggested that the amount be raised in shares of $50 each, payable in five annual installments.

Iowa

ROCKFORD is in the midst of a blessed, though quiet, revival which is not confined to the church. Since Jan. 1, 27 persons have united, nearly all on confession. By the bequest of a member the church comes into possession of $500 to be used in building a parsonage, which will be begun at once. Rev. E. L. Ely is pastor.

WASHTA, which has been pastorless for several months, has called Rev. Walter Radford, late of Eagle Grove. During his two weeks' visit here there were 41 accessions, all but one on confession. Special religious interest in the community has existed during the winter.

DAVENPORT.—Bethlehem celebrated the third anniversary of its organization Feb. 10. A pipe organ has been placed in the house as the gift of a friend. A kindergarten has been established and a sewing school opened which now has 35 pupils. Rev. Andrew Orth is pastor.

DOON.—As first fruits of the Hartsough union meetings 24 persons joined the church March 7, of whom 22 were heads of families. Others are expected to join soon. Rev. W. L. Brandt is pastor. Mr. Hartsough is now conducting meetings at Lake City.

Revival meetings are in progress at Correctionville, Congregationalists and Methodists uniting; at Orient and Gem Point, with special interest in both churches; and at Traer, where the pastor, Rev. O. O. Smith, has been assisted by his brother, Mr. F. G. Smith. The last named church has received 19 new members during the past two months.

Minnesota

LYLE.—The organization of a denominational Sunday school in place of the old union school, the formation of a choir with instrumental accompaniment, and accessions to congregation and church, under Rev. C. J. Swain, are reported. Rapid progress has been made during the past two years.

DAWSON.—Rev. S. R. Breish is obliged to take a vacation of two months on account of impaired health. The pulpit will be supplied by different brethren.

Rev. N. J. Bolin has commeced work at Upsala and finds large opportunities among the scattered Swedish population.

Nebraska

ALMA.—As March 14 was Rev. W. S. Hill's day at Naponee, the Y. P. S. C. E. at Alma, with the aid of the choir and other local talent, arranged a delightful program for the evening. The house was crowded and the leaders are so much encouraged that they intend to maintain the evening service the alternate Sundays which the pastor spends at Naponee. The citizens of Alma have put a $115 bell in the meeting house tower and the women continue payments on the parsonage debt to the C. C. B. S.

RISING CITY.—Special meetings, in which the pastor, Rev. C. J. Sage, has been assisted by Rev. G. J. Buck, closed March 14 with an earnest service. Some of the meetings had been held by request with the M. E. church, which on the closing evening omitted its service and came over in a body. A generous offering was given the evangelist for his work.

Baby Suffers With Scrofula.

"At the age of two months my baby began to have sores break out on his right cheek. We used all the local external applications we could think or hear of, all to no avail. The sores spread all over one side of his face. We consulted a physician and tried his medicine, and in a week the sore was well. But to my surprise in two weeks more another made its appearance on his arm. It grew worse and worse, and when he was three months old I began giving him Hood's Sarsaparilla. I also took Hood's Sarsaparilla, and before the first bottle was finished the sores were well and they have never returned. He is now four years old and has never had any sign of those scrofulous sores since he was cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla. He owes his smooth, fair skin to this great medicine."—Mrs. S. S. GOLD FURNITURE.

In these days of sound money it is not strange that gold furniture has an inviting sound, and that it is in high favor throughout the East.

Yet it takes surprisingly little of the gold coin of the realm to own a few pieces of this fascinating furniture.

The reason for this can be readily given. It is not the least exaggeration to say that we carry a larger assortment of gold furniture than any house in the United States. There are few furniture houses which show one-half as large a variety.

And with this great volume of trade come the low prices which have brought us the patronage in the first place, and which now retain it with us. A single visit to our warerooms will show the truth of this claim. Handling gold furniture in immense quantities, we can name very inexpensive figures for it.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK

The situation is mixed. Trade is not as active as it should be at this season of the year, and yet merchants are losing none of their confidence in a gradually improving business. Unfavorable weather in the Northwest and floods in the Mississippi and Ohio Valleys have had a deterrent influence on the movement of merchandise.

Spring trade in jobbing lines is practically over and some complaints are heard about the slowness of collections. Indications point to a fight over some of the schedules in the new tariff bill, but there is no question but that it will become law at a comparatively early date. The uncertainty about some of the duties is a factor of some slight trade disturbance, although as a whole the new tariff is favorably received by business interests.

Money has been in more active demand by importers, who are bringing in goods from abroad in anticipation of higher tariffs, and this has been the influence which has strengthened monetary rates. Business paper continues in small supply and note brokers are complaining of the dullness in their line.

Cotton goods are disappointing in movement and iron and steel are a little more listless in price and demand. Wool continues the active feature, and large sales are reported at advanced prices. Woolen manufacturers, too, report a better inquiry for goods, and it is believed that the improvement in this important industry will continue.

Prices for a good many staples show either advances or firmness, and this fact constitutes one of the most favorable features of the whole trade situation. In the stock markets speculation has evinced a fairly strong tone, but the outside public is not in the market as yet. Good stocks, however, are being absorbed by investors, and this is an exceedingly encouraging indication.

FROM CANADA

Poverty in Cities

According to published reports the distress in Canada is not so great as elsewhere, yet for several years the situation has been gradually growing more serious, and the present winter is proving exceptionally trying in the larger cities. Rev. Robert Hall, city missionary for Toronto, states that during his twelve years' experience he has never found so many honest and respectable families in need as this winter. In some cases the destitution is pitiful indeed, but excepting in Montreal such general distress is found nowhere in the Dominion.

Relief for India

Though "charity begins at home," and was never more needed here, generous contributions are being received from every quarter for India's relief. Premier Laurier was among the first to respond with a check of $100, and since that time provincial legislatures, city and town councils, churches and individuals have been making large donations, so that the total Canadian contributions already exceed $100,000. The largest grant was $6,000 from the Ontario legislature.

Prison Reform

This question is of growing interest in Canada. At the annual meeting of the Prisoners' Aid Association of Canada in Toronto last week, it was agreed to recommend a reformatory for inebriates, the reorganization of the womans' and boys' reformatories and the girls' refuge, and the improvement of county jails so that first offenders will not come in contact with hardened criminals. The association favored the forming of a provincial board of charities and correction similar to the State boards of the United States.

Sunday Observance

Another topic claims more than usual attention. In a former letter reference was made to the suit which the Lord's Day Alliance had entered against the Hamilton Street Car Railway Company for violation of the Lord's Day Act. Decision has just been given against the alliance, and it is now announced that an appeal will be made to the Supreme Court of Canada. The street car companies, however, have a decided advantage in a prolonged legal contest because of their strong financial backing, which they know well can be greatly increased by the operation of Sunday cars.

Temperance Too

Quite a ferment has been started in temperance circles over the proposed amendments of the license law by the Ontario Legislature. The amendments provide for the abolition of the saloon, the raising of the minor age limit from eighteen to twenty-one, and the reduction of the number of licenses to be granted. The legislation proposed is a great step in advance, but is not satisfactory to temperance advocates, who demand the fulfillment of the promise by the local government that enactments would be given to the full extent of its constitutional power. In view of the protests that are pouring in from every quarter, it is probable that Premier Hardy and his colleagues will reconsider the measure, and make it still more restrictive.

The Bishops Not Silenced

The hierarchy of Quebec is dying hard in its battle for separate schools for Manitoba. Notwithstanding the general acceptance of the settlement, the decisive verdict at by-elections, and the announcement of Hon. Edward Blake, who argued their cause before the privy council, that the judgment given does not call for the restoration of separate schools, the bishops seem determined not to let the matter rest. Following the banning of L'Electure was the condemning of its successor, Soleil, and several other Liberal papers. At present the power of the church is being used to secure the defeat of the Liberal candidate in the by-election of Champlain, and it is possible that the government may be compelled to take the unparalleled course of withholding the writ because of the impossibility of securing a fair and free election. The coming of an apostolic delegate from Rome to inquire into the school question is the latest phase of the situation. J. P. G.

REV. GEORGE H. WELLS, D. D.

To the brief announcement in our last week's issue respecting the tragic death of Dr. Wells, recently pastor of the Plymouth Church, Minneapolis, and for twenty-one years pastor of the American Presbyterian Church in Montreal, we are able now to add particulars.

Dr. Wells, since his resignation at Minneapolis over a year ago, had sought relief from sleeplessness and nervous exhaustion in travel, visiting the Sandwich Islands and Japan. More recently he had spent some weeks at Clifton Springs, but to no purpose. Saturday, March 13, he went to Chicago, where he was met by Dr. Lyman, one of the first physicians of the city, and taken to his house and kept over night. He was seen by several friends and, though exhibiting much of his old-time brilliancy of intellect, he was greatly depressed. Dr. Lyman advised him, as had the physician at Clifton Springs, to go to the sanitarium at Owatossa, Wis. Reaching the sanitarium in the afternoon of Saturday, and apparently willing to stay in it, his brother left him in good spirits and hopeful of recovery and return to work in the ministry. Early in the evening Dr. Wells took his handbag and slipped out of the house. His body was found on the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, with bruises indicating that he had been struck by the engine while walking towards it.

Dr. Wells was a graduate of Amherst College in 1863 and of the Chicago Theological Seminary in 1867. He was pastor in Amboy, Ill., for three years. He never married. His father, Deacon Wells of Dover, Ill., is still living and, although over ninety years of age, still takes a deep interest in all that concerns the kingdom of God. Dr. Wells was distinguished for his oratorical gifts, which made him an acceptable speaker on many important occasions. His style was picturesque and vivid, and his sermons and addresses were enriched by incidents and allusions gathered in his wide travels and by diligent study. His, too, was a substantial and thoroughly consecrated character. There will be many to mourn sincerely and deeply for him.

The news of Dr. Wells's death was a great shock to his old people at Plymouth Church, Minneapolis. The midweek meeting was devoted to a memorial service, a committee of the church attended the funeral service at Dover, and Dr. Beach preached a memorial sermon March 21. Dr. Wells was held in universal esteem and the city is saddened by his untimely death.

BIOGRAPHICAL

REV. LUTHER FARNHAM

Mr. Farnham, who died in Boston, March 15, aged 81 years, was born in Concord, N. H. He graduated from Dartmouth in 1837 and from Andover in 1841. He filled pastorates at Northfield, Plymouth, Marshfield, where Daniel Webster was among his parishioners, New Bedford and Gloucester. He did good work in the South in behalf of the blacks. He was the founder of the General Theological Library and one of its most active supporters. With untiring industry he labored to build up a valuable and useful library, succeeding finally in securing its present handsome building on Mt. Vernon Street, on which rests no debt, and in making it a favorite resort for students and book-lovers. His courtly yet genial bearing and his scholarly tastes made him a fit representative of the clergymen of the "old school." He was one of the oldest members of the Old South Church. Dr. Gordon officiated at the funeral, which was attended by a notable company.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST,

HYANNIS, which has been served in connection with Hemingford and Reno, will with its outstations soon form a field by itself. It is the only church and provides the only stated service in the whole county of Grant. A movement is on foot to erect a house of worship, parsonage and reading-room combined in the early spring, and Mr. B. H. Jones of the Senior Class, Oberlin, has been secured as pastor.

BERTRAND gave the pastor, Rev. F. D. Healey, and his bride a cordial reception March 10, immediately after the wedding. There was a large attendance and the people gave substantial testimony to their interest. A pleasant feature was the warm welcome to Rev. C. H. Huestis, a former pastor, who officiated at the marriage, and to his wife.

STANTON, which has been pastorless since October last, is making a strong effort to pay its indebtedness preparatory to calling another pastor. Neighboring ministers are supplying the pulpit.

VERDON.—Rev. W. J. Isaacs has been invited to remain another year after the expiration of the present engagement. He has also been granted a vacation to visit his old home in Ohio.

Supt. J. D. Stewart of C. S. S. and P. S. and his wife have been holding S. S. institutes with good interest and results. The one held March 4-7 at Linwood, where Rev. W. A. Davies is pastor, was of great help to S. S. workers. In that held with Park church, in Antelope County, March 11-14, the people showed much interest, bringing provisions daily for a picnic dinner, so that the whole day could be given to Bible study. Park church, which is yoked with West Cedar Valley, desires Rev. C. H. Kershaw to remain a second year.

PACIFIC COAST

California

REDLANDS.—Since Jan. 1, 1896, the church has received 51 new members, 14 on confession, making the present membership 264. It has just canceled a debt of $2,100, given to Pomona College about $850, and contributed to religious charities about $700. Rev. J. H. Williams is pastor.

MILL VALLEY.—Rev. John Rea, the first pastor, through whose untiring efforts the handsome new edifice has been erected, is about to close his labors in order to assume the assistant pastorate of First Presbyterian Church of Oakland.

SAN FRANCISCO.—Third. At the March meeting of the Men's League the subject of Arbitration was considered in various aspects, especially religious and political.

The Mills meetings in Oakland, in which several churches united, received careful preparation and yielded a rich harvest of souls. Mr. Mills went from there to Alameda, where his labors are greatly blessed.——At Weaverville Rev. H. H. Cole is holding special services during Lent.——At the annual meeting of Santa Cruz church it was found the expenses had been $2,600 and the benevolences $378.——Among the six accessions at San José, March 7, was a man 76 years old.

Oregon

PORTLAND.—Mississippi Avenue. Rev. H. W. Young, pastor, who has had poor health for several months, went a few weeks ago to the mountains of Southern Oregen to recuperate. He is now gradually improving, and with returning strength is doing needed missionary work, not only by carrying the gospel to numerous families who have not heard the "good news" for years, but by sytematically distributing religious and general literature; also by supplying clothing to the destitute, through appeal to some of the stronger churches of the State. Rev. D. B. Gray, city missionary, supplies during Mr. Young's absence.——First. The influence of Rev. Arthur W. Ackerman, the new pastor, is coming to be strongly felt in all the activities of the church. Never have the morning congregations been better than now, and those of the evening are constantly increasing. The pastor uses no startling methods, but depends solely upon the drawing power of the gospel faithfully presented. Entire harmony prevails. The Ladies' Aid Society has formed a literary club to meet once a month. Mr. Ackerman recently organized a pastor's class, composed of children within and outside the Sunday school, not Christians, meeting once a week. Attendance and interest are growing and much good seems certain to result from the effort. The vexed problem of how to maintain a weekly S. S. teachers' meeting seems to have been practically solved here. Regular meetings have been held since November and the interest is growing. Mr. Ackerman provides an outline a week before each meeting, and three topics suggesting different phases of the lesson are given to teachers to work out. They bring brief results of their study and suggestions and questions as to methods. The sessions follow the prayer meeting and last forty minutes.

As a result of special meetings at Ontario, under the leadership of Rev. David Leppert, pastor at Huntington, 22 persons were brought into the church.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, MARCH 19

During the last year Miss Stone of Philippopolis has frequently contributed to the interest of the Friday meeting, and this time as leader, reading 1 Cor. 9: 19-27. She spoke of the work of the Lord as free, "beginning at this Jerusalem, Boston, and reaching out over all the world," embracing not only Bulgaria, where her lot is cast, or the whole Balkan peninsula, now the center of so much solicitude, but every land, especially those fields personally represented, Africa, Turkey, Japan and India. Reading the names of missionaries in West Central Africa that have passed under hundreds of eyes as the calendar has been scanned the past week, she seemed to bring them into the very circle of praying hearts. Referring to Mrs. Stover's story of Cato, the devoted preacher, in the Missionary Herald, she gave her own association with the name as belonging to her valued horse, which Chelsea children sent her money to buy several years ago. Mrs. Stover writes of her disappointment in not being able to return to her work the present year as she had hoped, even though the delay allows her to remain with her daughter Helen, who is in this country for study. Dr. Mary A. Holbrook, recently from Kobe College, included the meeting in her flying visit of a few hours, and spoke of the great comfort she had found in the assurance that by whatever fetters missionary workers may find themselves bound the Spirit of God is free.

Mrs. Kellogg introduced a company of three associated with the Huguenot school at Wellington, South Africa, whom it was a joy to welcome to this fellowship. Miss Cummings, having spent seven years in that school, has now for two years and a half represented it in this country. She spoke of the South African question as not one touching the output of gold, or the value of diamonds, or who shall rule in the Transvaal, but the employing of 30,000 men in the diamond region and 50,000 in the building of railroads and other enterprises. This means that the light of the gospel is to shine in that land. Of the 700,000 white people in South Africa 500,000 are Boers, many of them descendants of Huguenots who were banished from France near the end of the seventeenth century, and, alas! not carrying the gospel into the new dwelling place. It is the aim of Andrew Mvrray to get into these homes. He has 800 young women under instruction in four schools, and as one result of this work, begun twenty-four years ago, 500 have gone out as teachers.

Mrs. Allen of Meriden gave an interesting account of a visit made four years ago to her sister, Miss Ferguson, who is well known as associated with this work from its very beginning. Mrs. Veeder was also introduced, who is going out for the first time.

Miss Child reported Dr. Rose A. Bower of Bailundu busy in her double capacity of teacher and doctor, encouraging the natives to pay for the medicine which they were inclined to feign illness to secure for the sake of the bottle or tin cup which contained it. Miss Lamson read letters from the Melville sisters at Chisamba, while Mrs. Fay and the rest were not forgotten.

AN ARTISTIC POINT.—It is a fact well understood by artists and clever furnishers that color goes a long way in any scheme of interior decoration. Better than any color, however, is the glitter of gold, and this is one reason why it is so fashionable to have one or two pieces of gold furniture in the drawing room of a town house. Our readers should understand that the best place to purchase gold furniture in the entire United States is right here in the city of Boston, at the warerooms of the Paine Furniture Co , on Canal Street.

PRAYER MEETING

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN

April 4–10. Lessons From Christ's Miracles. Matt. 11: 2–6; John 14: 8–14.

If Jesus had worked no miracles we still would have believed in him and trusted to him for our salvation. But inasmuch as the record of these mighty works is so clear and indisputable, we must conclude that they furnish another means of understanding his wondrous nature; that the purpose and method underlying each and all are another key to the mind and heart of the Saviour. First of all the ease with which he performed them impresses us. However remarkable, none appear to begin to exhaust his power. No more effort on his part seems to have been required to open blind eyes or multiply the loaves than is apparent in the framing of those wonderful sayings, whose beauty and power have charmed all the centuries.

Yet Jesus was never prodigal of this capacity to work miracles. He held it in reserve for the fit occasion. Least of all would he use it in his own behalf, even when sorely tempted so to do. Even when he might have summoned legions of angels to defend him he kept silent. What drew forth the power was the need, the wretchedness, the sorrow of others. How many times the record says, "Being moved with compassion." He held this great power as he held all his other divine attributes—in trust for his fellowmen.

Study shows us, also, that Jesus put a lower value upon his miracles as credentials of himself than he did upon his character. He knew that a man who could not see the beauty of holiness embodied in his human life would not be brought into the kingdom by startling effects in nature. He was anxious to have men seek him, not for the loaves and fishes, but for the truth and the inspiration which he could give them, and he coveted such responsiveness on the part of his disciples as would make them, in time, able to perform the greatest of all miracles—that of changing the purpose and affections of the human heart. Should we be any better off if we could walk on the waters, or heal all manner of diseases? Would the kingdom of God come faster if Christians could do all sorts of prodigies? Jesus did not think so. But he yearned for men who in the moral realm would exercise the same power which he put forth, would lift others from sin to God and reconstruct human society on the basis of his teachings. We study his miracles in vain if we do not gain from them this lesson of crucial importance.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES

The first society in Denmark has been formed.

A nurses' society has been organized in a hospital at Elizabeth, N. J., the matron of the nurses' home being president.

Dr. Clark's work in India, outside of Bombay, was not hindered much by the plague. He is spending March in South Africa.

In Los Angeles the first week of April will be kept as a week of prayer for the outpouring of the Spirit upon the California societies.

Candidates for active membership in an Australian society must attend and take part in four consecutive meetings before they are admitted.

Many California letters now bear a stamp a little larger than a postage stamp, printed in yellow and brown, giving a reminder of the date and place of the coming convention.

An Irish National C. E. Council of 20 members has been formed, Belfast being represented by 12 and Dublin and the southern and western parts of the island by the remainder.

A prison society in Alabama is visited every other week by the State president, as they are not allowed to meet except when a visitor is present. Seven of the members have been admitted to church membership.

Some Ohio Endeavorers have established a scholarship in one of their denominational colleges, furnishing a year's free tuition to a properly qualified Endeavorer belonging to their denomination in their section of the State.—The Lutheran Endeavorers of the State are interested in an effort to furnish a ward in a mission hospital in Liberia.

Dr. Clark's going to Agra was the occasion for five meetings, two in the Havelock Baptist Chapel. A group of 12 Endeavorers also enjoyed a short service in the Taj Mahal. In Agra Dr. Clark was met by Rev. A. G. McGaw, the Christian Endeavor superintendent of northern India, who accompanied him on the rest of his journey through that part of the country.

The Endeavorers of the District of Columbia showed their appreciation of the services of the Committee of '96 by arranging a rally that crowded the First Congregational Church in Washington. Several five-minute addresses were made and each member of the convention committee was given a framed copy of a finely engrossed resolution expressing thanks for their work.

A Christian citizenship conference has been held in Chicago by the State superintendents of Christian citizenship from five neighboring States. Cordial letters were received from Theodore Roosevelt, Governor Pingree and President Gompers. A general discussion of a large number of important practical points was held, and an address issued to Endeavorers generally urged the establishment of a Christian citizenship department in every State, district, union and society.

Among the banners to be awarded at San Francisco is the Lord's Day banner, suggested by Rev. W. F. Crafts, to be given to the State reporting the best record of work done for better observance of the Lord's Day. Each society should report to its State secretary what it has accomplished along this line, and the secretaries should report to Secretary Baer by June 1. Literature as to the scheme can be had by addressing the Reform Bureau, 210 Delaware Avenue, N. E , Washington, D. C.

A REMARKABLE WOMAN

BY REV. A. H. PLUMB, D. D.

Mrs. Nancy Swift Hanchett, mother of Mrs. Mary H. Hunt of Boston, died at Leominster, March 8, at the advanced age of ninety-two years. Two other children mourn her loss—a son, Dr. Thatcher S. Hanchett, a physician of renown in Torrington, Ct., and Mrs. N. S. Chase of Leominster, Mass., where the last years of her life had been spent. Her funeral in Leominster, at which Rev. Dr. Scott officiated, occurred March 10. Memorial services conducted by Rev. P. B. Davis and Rev. Drs. Allbright, Archibald and Plumb, were also held later in the day at the chapel in Forest Hills Cemetery, Boston, where she was interred.

Mrs. Hanchett was a direct descendant from Edward Winslow, elected governor of the Plymouth Colony in 1633, and also from Rev. Dr. Thomas Thacher, the first pastor of the Old South Church, Boston, a man who, though shut out from Oxford as a Nonconformist, was accounted the first Hebrew and Arabic scholar in this country. Among her ancestry were many prominent persons who were active in resisting religious tyranny in England, and who in America helped to found Harvard College "For Christ and the Church," to secure our national independence, to form the Constitution of the United States, to maintain the evangelical faith against the withering blight of a skeptical rationalism, and generally to aid all patriotic movements, as well as the work of moral and religious reform.

Mrs. Hanchett remembered seeing the floor of her father's house at Barnstable covered at night with the sleeping forms of citizen soldiery, gathered and waiting to repel a threatened British invasion in the War of 1812, so that her memories, as well as the tradition of her family history, aided in giving her, at an early age, a strongly philanthropic and religious spirit and activity worthy of her honorable lineage. Naturally, too, she became an ardent sympathizer with her husband, Ephraim Hanchett, who was the first vice-president of Lyman Beecher's pioneer temperance society in Connecticut, and also an intelligent and eloquent advocate of the abolition of slavery.

He, with his father and grandfather, had been active in developing that early and famous industry at Salisbury, Ct., by which Washington got the iron for his cannon, and our infant commerce its anchors and chains. Fitly it has been her grandson, Capt. Alfred E. Hunt, who has been a leading spirit in establishing and guiding another infant industry, already attaining giant proportions at Niagara, the manufacture of aluminum.

American society, it has often been remarked, has not sufficiently recognized its indebtedness to the law of heredity in our history. Gratitude is due to God for keeping alive the succession of able and worthy men and women who have made up our leading families, and who have very largely given to our New England and American life its distinctive impress.

Mrs. Hanchett was a woman richly endowed, honorably connected and also nobly trained, for by her natural tastes and her favored companionships she early attained the three leading elements of a true education—an intelligent comprehension of the great plans of God for the happiness of the individual and the progress of the race, a cordially appreciative sympathy with those plans, and a vigorous self-sacrificing co-operation with them. She thus not only came to attain a high degree of personal worth, but also became a wholesome and effective force in society.

If the mothers make the daughters, then it is largely owing to her care and prayers that her daughter, in obedience to a call which her mother's strong faith said came from God, has been the leading spirit in the great providential movement known the world over as the American Educational Method for the Prevention of Intemperance, and in the prosecution of which she has addressed more legislative committees and assemblies than any other person ever did, and has been instrumental in securing for over sixteen millions of children the warning instruction of science against any indulgence in intoxicating drinks.

It was a beautiful type of Christian womanhood which this venerable mother in Israel exhibited, even down to the age of ninety-two, with fresh sympathies, wise counsels and continual prayers to the last. By such lives human progress is marked, as the felicitous expression of Rev. Dr. Storrs declares: "It is a fact significant of the past, prophetic of the future, that even as Dante measured his successive ascents in paradise, not by immediate consciousness of movement, but by seeing an ever lovelier beauty in the face of Beatrice, so the race now counts the gradual steps of its spiritual progress out of the heavy glooms toward the glory of the Christian millennium, not by mechanisms, not by cities, but by the ever new grace and force exhibited by the woman who was for ages either the decorated toy of man or his despised and abject drudge."

The secret of the highest type of Christian womanhood, such as this sainted disciple showed, can be learned from a single verse in the inspired description of the darkest hour of human history which was also the brightest. For it is there written: "Many women were there, beholding afar off, which followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto him." These three things exalt woman to her highest loveliness and her greatest worth—her true vision of Christ, her obedient following of Christ, her loving ministry to Christ, serving his church and his poor.

To develop muscle, if that is what you're doing the washing for, perhaps the old way of washing with soap—rubbing the clothes up and down over a board—may be pretty good. SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS FOR THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

The new international Sunday school lesson committee held its first meeting in Philadelphia last week, continuing in session Wednesday and Thursday. It was organized by the choice of Rev. John Potts, D. D., of Toronto as chairman and Rev. A. E. Dunning, D. D., as secretary. Two members have continued in the committee from its beginning, twenty-seven years, Mr. B. F. Jacobs and Rev. Dr. Warren Randolph, both Baptists. One misses some familiar faces, Bishop Vincent and Dr. Hall especially. The death of Dr. John A. Broadus was a sad loss to the committee. But it has been strengthened by its new members. Dr. A. F. Schauffler brings to it a long and successful Sunday school experience; so also do Bishop Warren of Colorado and Mr. J. R. Pepper, an energetic layman of Tennessee, and Principal Rexford of Montreal.

The committee includes five professors in active service as teachers, two bishops, two pastors, three other clergymen occupying important positions in their respective denominations, two laymen and one editor. They represent ten religious denominations.

In view of the necessity for the selection of a new course of lessons beginning in 1900, the committee had extended an invitation to all who use the international lessons to offer suggestions, either in person or in writing. A public meeting for this purpose was held in the Y. M. C. A. building on Wednesday afternoon. Addresses were made by a number of prominent Sunday school workers and writers of lesson helps. Among them were Rev. Dr. F. N. Peloubet and M. C. Hazard, Ph. D., of Boston, Mrs. E. S. Tead of Somerville, Rev. Dr. H. Clay Trumbull of the Sunday School Times, Drs. R. G. Seymour and Edwin W. Rice, Israel Black, Mrs. M. A. Kennedy, Mrs. W. F. Crafts, Miss Mary S. Butler and several others.

Suggestions in writing were sent to the committee by Prof. Willis J. Beecher of Auburn, N. Y., Prof. M. B. Riddle of Alleghany, Pa., Rev. Dr. J. R. Miller of Philadelphia and a large number besides. These, with a stenographic report of the addresses made at the meeting, were at the disposal of the committee, whose time in private session was largely spent in their consideration. A separate course for primary classes was urged by some and opposed by others, as also a course for advanced Bible classes. Several asked for a graded system of lessons, with different Scripture passages for each grade. The usual pleas for special recurring lessons enforcing such virtues as temperance, Sabbath keeping, kindness to animals, peace among nations, etc., were presented. The committee also considered plans which had been elaborated by its own members and completed the revision of the series for 1899. The last committee adopted the custom, which will be continued, of submitting the scheme for each year to several prominent lesson writers, with request for their suggestions.

The public meeting was held in the Chambers Memorial Presbyterian Church in the evening, with addresses by several new members of the committee, after which, at an informal reception, many of the pastors and Sunday school workers of the city and vicinity enjoyed an hour of social intercourse. The committee will consider separately the plans which they have discussed together, and will meet in Washington November next to decide on the course of lessons to be proposed for the six years beginning with 1900. SUNDAY SCHOOL NOTES

Several members of the Framingham Primary Teachers' Union have taken the normal course prepared by George W. Pease, and passed an examination. Four obtained the required 70 per cent., or more, and one 92 per cent., and are awarded the diploma given by the Massachusetts Sunday School Association.

Massachusetts has enrolled in all of her public schools only 412,000, with 12,027 superintendents, principals and teachers. In the 1,915 Sunday schools there are more than three times the number of officers and teachers, or 39,000 engaged in instructing the Sunday schools, having a total enrollment of 326,115.

The executive committee of the School for Christian Workers at Springfield has approved of a recommendation to change the name to The Bible Teachers' College, on the ground that the two fundamental ideas of the institution, for both the Sunday school and missionary work, are the "Bible," and a "teaching ministry" of the Bible.

Boston district of the State Association will hold its fourth meeting on Monday afternoon and evening, March 29. Rev. John E. Tuttle, D. D., of the new Union Congregational Church, Worcester, will speak in the evening on The Sunday School's Two-Fold Power, and Hon. S. B. Capen will preside. A review of the second quarter's lesson will be a feature of the afternoon, and Miss Daisy L. Blaisdell will read a paper on What Is Good Sunday School Teaching from an Educational Standpoint.

There are 5,306 Sunday schools in Indiana, enrolling 432,312 scholars and 60,538 officers and teachers. The buildings in which these schools are held, allowing an average width of 30 feet to each, would extend over 30 miles. It would require a superintendent seven and a half weeks to shake hands with all, if he worked eight hours each day and shook hands with 25 persons each minute. This is but one division of the 45, and by no means the largest division, engaged in the systematic study of the Word of God in America alone.

At Chicopee Falls, Mass., the three schools recently united to hold a local convention with three sessions. The four schools in Chicopee were invited to attend the meetings, which began on Saturday evening and continued on Sunday afternoon and evening, each session being held in a different church. At the first session only 80 were present, at the second between two and three hundred and at the last the Congregational church seating over 500 was crowded. The meetings resulted in forming a permanent organization of the seven schools of the city to prosecute aggressive and progressive work.

There doesn't seem to be very much the matter with your child. He doesn't actually lose weight, but there is no gain. He belongs to that large class of children that don't seem to prosper. You look at him a little more thoughtfully than you do at the rest and say "He is not doing well." Failure to gain in weight in a child is a danger signal. Scott's Emulsion should be taken at once. It puts on fat where health demands it, strengthening the digestion.

The Fairy of Health Who Brings Happiness into Our Homes.

Like the good old story of the fairy who brought into the homes of sorrow and suffering the light of peace and joy, so the wonderful Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy, the grand medicine which makes people well, cures the sick and ailing, and replaces weakness and suffering by perfect health and strength, is the modern fairy which brings into homes dark with the sorrow and discouragement of disease the blessing of hope, health, happiness.

Mrs H. Young, Littleton, N. H., writes:

"Last fall I found myself in an extremely nervous and debilitated condition and greatly troubled with sleeplessness. My condition was caused by overwork. I was often obliged to get up at night and sit up for a long while, then go to bed and sleep awhile, then get up again and sit awhile longer, and in this manner I failed to get much needed refreshing sleep. Hearing of many cures, my husband insisted on my trying Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy. I got a bottle and tried it, and received so much help that I procured a second bottle, and now find myself entirely cured. I can truly say that Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy is an excellent medicine, and cordially recommend it to all. I will gladly answer inquiries as to my cure."

Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy is the people's guardian of health, which wards off disease and gives the sick and ailing renewed health and strength. The spring is the best time to take it, for everybody needs a spring medicine. Dr. Greene's Cathartic Pills are the sure cure for sour stomach, biliousness and constipation. It is the best, surest, easiest pill to take. Small, sugar coated, pleasant to act.

Dr. Greene, 34 Temple Place, Boston, Mass., the successful physician in curing diseases, can be consulted free, personally or by letter. Nothing to pay for consultation, examination or advice, and the low prices of his wonderful health-giving medicines place a sure cure in reach of everybody.

Bicycle Suits

Nothing that we have done for months appears to have given our customers so much satisfaction as this "MARCH OFFER" to "have made to order from Special Measures Suits like almost any of our New Spring Models at the SAME PRICE as the ready-made Suits." There is a large variety of New Spring Suitings to select from. We have already taken orders for several hundred Suits; many have been received and have given such satisfaction that other members of the customer's family have come in to place orders before the offer expires (March 31, 5.30 P. M.). Of all the Special orders that have been completed only one has been so wide of the mark that the most trifling alteration has not made it a perfect fit; that one case was so very wide of the mark that it bore no resemblance to what was wanted and we must have transposed some of our measurements in sending them to the Tailor.

REASSURANCE

BECAUSE the bitter winds are out,
And the mellow days of autumn gone—
Because the storm-fiends run and shout
And scrawl red fingers on the dawn,

Should we lose hope, and weeping say,
"Our joy is hid 'neath the drift on the lawn;
And love was buried yesterday,
And the tender mercy of God withdrawn"?

Nay, nay, for the very winds that blow
Heavy with death will come again
With April music, and none will know
That life held ever a tear or a pain.

The lilac that sways so naked today,
With twisted arms to the sunless sky,
Will see spring coming the same old way,
And shake out her green leaves merrily.

So heart, my heart, though today be drear,
And joy be burdened with doubt awhile,
Know that God holds you a smile and a tear,
And tomorrow, perchance, you will see him and smile.

Written for The Congregationalist by THEODORE ROBERTS

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, MARCH 26

Miss Nathalie Lord read without comment the account of our Lord's last sufferings, leaving the story, as she said, to make its own impression. Miss Child asked special prayer for India, for those suffering from pestilence and famine and for the missionaries and their work. Letters had been received within the last two weeks from Ahmednagar, telling of special needs in the girls' school there. The advance in the price of grain would make it impossible to carry on the school with the money granted in ordinary times, even if the missionaries in charge should put all their salaries into the school fund, as they had done for a few months past. Unless help should reach them some of the pupils must be sent to their homes, and perhaps to starvation. Economy had been practiced to the last point, there not being even a proper supply of soap and towels, a change of clothing for the night, nor protection from the damp earth floor and from cold while they slept. Miss Child testified to the fine work done in this school, at present in charge of Miss Emily Bissell and Miss Moulton, and in other departments of Christian effort in Ahmednagar. Prayers were asked for Miss Nugent, who has been most efficient as the head of this school and who is now in this country on account of impaired health, and for Miss Stockbridge in her work in the Hindu girls' schools and with the Bible women in the homes of the people. Some description was given of the peculiar customs that form such barriers to the progress of the gospel among them. All these missionaries, also Mrs. Bissell, in charge of a district and instructing Bible women, Mrs. James Smith, who has recently returned after a brief visit in the home land, and the various lines of effort were included in the fervent prayers which were offered, led by Mrs. Miron Winslow, Mrs. Thompson, Miss Susan N. Brown, Miss Fay and Mrs. Strong.

Mrs. Kellogg spoke of the superabundant mercy and blessing which we enjoy as the intended means of extending blessing to others that God's way may be known among the nations, and in connection with the limited activity of Christian people quoted the African chief, who said it was "so late," he had so many times promised his people that teachers should be sent to them and none had appeared. The lesson drawn from this thought was, "We must have more givers."

A CHANCE OF TODAY.—In another part of this paper there is a striking and most practical demonstration of the effect of the election excitement on present prices. Every one of our readers will admit that so staple an article as furniture ought to be little affected by election excitement. Yet this is far from the facts. In another column will be seen an advertisement of a $60 sideboard, which is offered by the Paine Furniture Co. at $38. This is what the excitement of election can do for prices

A POINT TO REMEMBER.—If you wish to purify your blood you should take a medicine which cures blood diseases. The record of cures by Hood's Sarsaparilla proves that this is the best medicine for the blood ever produced. Hood's Sarsaparilla cures the most stubborn cases and it is the medicine for you to take if your blood is impure.

Volume LXXXII Boston Thursday 1 April 1897 Number 13

TRIAL SUBSCRIPTIONS
6 Months for $1.00
3 Months for 25 cts. 4 Weeks Free.

AS Easter approaches many sermons will be prepared on the life beyond death. In recent years this subject, in pulpit discourses, has mainly been limited to that anniversary. Intense interest in the present life has obscured the vision of the church into the hereafter. But thoughtful men are beginning to turn anew to the problems of the future world, and questions concerning it in the popular mind are pressing more earnestly for answer. One sign of this is Dr. George A. Gordon's recent volume on Immortality and its cordial reception. Another is the series of twelve addresses just finished on the same general subject, given on Sunday afternoons by eminent scholars at the University of Chicago. Elsewhere we note that ministers are discussing the doctrine of immortality as it appears in the works of great poets. This reviving interest in the future life is most welcome. Without it ideals dwindle, courage fails, sin loses its hatefulness, love fades and falters. Many Christians, even, have been so eager to exalt and ennoble the present life that they have practically divorced it from the future, to find its grandeur shrink and shrivel, they know not why. New emphasis on that which is immortal in every human being will give new dignity to all Christian service. And faith will find no stable thing to grasp, in reaching into the hereafter, other than what it finds in Jesus Christ. Other men have had visions of heaven and hell. Literature is rich with dreams and hopes of the one and fears of the other. But only Jesus Christ has brought life and immortality to light, and only those who know him are sure of eternal life. "He that hath the Son hath the life. He that hath not the Son hath not the life."

Some of the facts in Prof. Williston Walker's instructive paper read at last week's meeting of the Boston Congregational Club ought not to slip from memory until they set a train of thought in motion. In 1760, said he, there were 483 pastors in active service in New England; of these 456 had been trained at Harvard, Yale or Princeton, leaving less than 6 per cent. who had not received what the age deemed an adequate training. Of the 1,730 Congregational ministers who died between Jan. 1, 1875, and Dec. 31, 1895, 488 were not college graduates, i. e., 28 per cent., and 493 without seminary training, i. e., 29 per cent. In 1894 124 graduated from our seminaries, while 234 were ordained to the Congregational ministry. If every member of every Senior Class in all our Congregational seminaries had not merely graduated, but been ordained to the Congregational ministry, for the last twenty-one years (which is far from the case), there would still be 1,724 names of those added to our ministry during that period who never graduated at a Congregational seminary. Dr. Walker ventured the conjecture that one-half of those added to our ministry in the last twenty years had not had what we deem, in theory at least, an adequate training for its work. These carefully digested statistics indicate a serious lowering of the estimate in which the denomination holds an educated ministry. We doubt, however, if the showing is any better for other denominations.

One of our most cultivated laymen, who listened to the addresses of the theological professors at the Boston Club, while admitting the justice of their contentions in behalf of an educated ministry, says that in his opinion the seminaries sometimes have themselves to blame because of the apparent preference by the churches for partially trained men over those who have received a suitable education. The atmosphere of a divinity school, this layman thinks, is apt to be unfavorable to the development of the spiritual life. Theology is approached as a science would be, and so much strength being necessarily expended upon criticism and investigation the men have little time and inclination left for real soul culture. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that some churches select for their leaders men of large, warm hearts, even though they may not have had the training of the schools. We commend the kindly criticism of the layman, which in our judgment also has much force, to the attention of our seminary professors.

Brooklyn Congregationalists are sufficiently devoted to the cause of church extension to give to the subject an entire meeting of their club. The speeches at the gathering last week, by prominent pastors of the city, reveal an encouraging realization of local problems, as well as a disposition to meet them by a strong union movement. Both Dr. Abbott and Dr. Behrends professed hearty adherence to Congregationalism and believe that its churches should be wisely multiplied. Dr. R. J. Kent, the new superintendent of the local church extension society, felt that from the Atlantic to the Pacific there was no better field for advancing Congregationalism than greater New York. His was a clarion call to move forward in the face of apparent obstacles, to confide in the divine mission of Congregationalism, and act accordingly. One of his practical suggestions was to begin with the children in the Sunday schools of New York and Brooklyn and educate them to believe in church extension and make them, in their small way, givers to the cause from their very childhood. We are glad to learn that last Sunday Dr. Behrends's church raised nearly $2,000 for this cause.

Speaking of church extension, the organization of the new church in Pittsfield—the Pilgrim Memorial, which is described in our news columns this week—deserves to be noted. Here is one of the small cities in our own State, possessing already three well-established Congregational churches, that is awake to the opportunities which its normal growth presents. So few new churches are founded in the East that an addition to our number which represents so much wise aggressiveness as this new field in Pittsfield is to be welcomed. We recall no other comparable to it within two or three years save the Leyden, at Brookline. The mother church, the First, besides giving a number of its own members, went so far as to yield to its pastorate Mr. Calkins, who only a few months ago was summoned to be assistant pastor at the First Church. We mark also the simplicity of the declaration of faith, which declares that the only Scriptural qualification for church membership is a heart regenerated through a personal faith in Jesus Christ and a godly life. For testimony the church approves and intends to teach the doctrines and practices of the apostolic, primitive and evangelical churches substantially as set forth in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds and in the summary of the Burial Hill declaration of faith. But the only bond of union and condition of fellowship is love and loyalty to Christ and the covenant with him and one another. This minimizing of explicit declarations on successive points of theology and this emphasizing of the experiential side of Christianity are significant tokens of the trend of the time.

The efforts made by the Home Missionary Society through the Howard Roll of Honor and by the American Missionary Association through the Jubilee Fund have not succeeded in canceling their debts. The debt of the American Board was wiped out last year, but its receipts have decreased so much during the months of the current year already passed that unless a large gain is made during the next five months it is difficult to see how its appropriations can be met without incurring another debt. The work of our three largest benevolent societies will be seriously hampered unless their obligations can be provided for. If each of them at the same time appeals to the churches to pay a large debt, in addition to regular contributions, there will be great danger of discouragement and failure. We do not wonder that the Eastern committee appointed at the A. M. A. meeting last October to aid in raising its debt finds the situation perplexing. At a recent session held in Boston, after canvassing the matter carefully, this committee agreed that it would be wise for that society to make an effort, when a suitable time arrives, conjointly with the other societies, to raise the amount needed by them all to cancel their indebtedness. The members of this co-operating committee, Rev. Henry Fairbanks of St. Johnsbury, Vt., Rev. Arthur Little, D. D., of Dorchester, Rev. Wallace Nutting, D. D., of Providence, and Rev. H. P. Dewey of Concord, N. H., are men of discretion and influence. Their conclusions will have much weight. There are serious difficulties in the way of such a joint effort, but the situation is a very serious one, and some action will be imperative before long or our missionary work must be greatly reduced.

THE BRADFORD MANUSCRIPT

Some time ago, at Senator Hoar's suggestion, the Massachusetts Historical Society passed a resolution requesting Ambassador Bayard to make an effort to secure the return to the United States of the original manuscript of Gov. William Bradford's Brief History of Plymouth Plantations. This most valuable work has been for a long time in the library of Lambeth Palace in London, the official dwelling of the Archbishop of Canterbury. A considerable portion of its history is blank. Handed down by the author to his descendants, it passed from hand to hand until in the time of the Revolution it was in the Prince Library in the tower of the Old South Church in this city. Then it disappeared. Apparently some one who appreciated its great value carried it back to England. How it found its way into the Lambeth library is unknown. But it is now many years since certain extracts from the manuscript in the library were recognized as identical with passages known to have been quoted from the original. This, of course, led to a search and comparison, and the identity of the manuscript in the library was established, both by internal evidence and by notes upon its pages.

The attempt to secure its return to this country has been made once or twice before, but in vain. This time the request of the Massachusetts Historical Society, warmly indorsed by other historical societies, by Senator Hoar and other eminent men, and by our Government, has been favorably heard. Mr. Bayard's personal relations with the ecclesiastical as well as the civil authorities in England have been so cordial that no more fortunate advocate of the American claim could have been chosen. When he made his request the Archbishop of Canterbury at once replied that, although it would be necessary to secure the consent of the permanent authorities of the diocese of London, he personally was quite willing to do all in his power to secure the desired result. News has just come that these authorities have readily yielded their consent, upon condition that a certified copy of the manuscript be placed in the Lambeth library in the place of the original, and that, should Englishmen desire access to the original for any worthy purpose, it be granted. These reasonable conditions of course will be complied with, and the manuscript will immediately be returned to this country.

It is understood that it will be taken to Plymouth and be placed with the other relics of the first settlers which compose the unique and priceless collection in Pilgrim Hall. Certainly this is the most appropriate disposition of it, but, if our impression be correct that Pilgrim Hall is not fire proof, precautions should be taken first for the proper protection of this invaluable manuscript. Indeed, there are many other unique and precious historical treasures in the Plymouth collection which should not be exposed to the least risk.

Inasmuch as several editions of the work have been published, notably Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s beautiful facsimile edition, within a year, no further additions from this quarter to the sum of knowledge of the Pilgrim Fathers is to be expected. But it is extremely appropriate that the original should be returned to this country, and to the very spot where it was written, and where undeniably its author expected that it would remain. It is a singular blunder, by the way, to call the manuscript, as some journals are terming it, "the log of the Mayflower." It is not a log-book but a brief history of the rise of the Pilgrim movement, the residence in Holland and the first generation of the colony at Plymouth. The voyage of the Mayflower fills but a scanty space. The courtesy of the English authorities in the matter deserves hearty recognition, although of course the American claim was entirely just.

TWENTIETH CENTURY SUNDAY SCHOOLS

What will they be and do? The question has already begun to be answered. The International Lesson Committee are now considering plans for courses of study covering six years, beginning with 1900. Will the scheme which they shall adopt be accepted by a large proportion of the Sunday schools of the world?

Thus far their work has apparently not lost ground. Other plans of Bible study find favor, and a considerable number of Sunday schools, besides classes in a larger number, are trying or have tried these plans. Many of those who have tried them have testified of their value. But most of these schools return after a time to the International lesson system. It has bad much criticism, seemingly more abundant within the last three or four years. Yet from statements made at the recent meeting of the Lesson Committee in Philadelphia, it would appear that the system was never more popular than now. For example, it was there stated that of the 981 Baptist Sunday schools in New England 957 are using the International lessons. Secretary Worden of the Presbyterian Board of Publication said that over ninety-eight per cent. of the Sunday schools of the Presbyterian church use these lessons. Similar statements came from Methodist bodies and from other denominations, warranting the inference that at least nine-tenths of the Protestant Sunday schools of the United States and Canada prefer the International Lessons to any others that have yet been presented to them.

With these facts before them it can hardly be expected that the new committee will venture on a radical departure from a system which has won the field and held it so long against all competitors. No one at the meeting referred to recommended such a step, though suggestions were freely invited. Many, both in person and by letter, presented strong reasons against any such step, and among these were not a few of long experience and national influence in Sunday school work. In two respects, however, changes were urged. Several desired a separate course of lessons for primary classes. Some wished for another course for advanced Bible classes. Beside these, a few desired that the committee should prepare supplemental lessons, devotional and doctrinal, and not altogether confined to the Bible.

How far the commitee will act on these suggestions remains to be seen. Its members themselves do not yet know. More than half of them are entering on their first term of service. They have ideas of their own and will doubtless make improvements on previous courses. But they will hardly expect to command universal support or to provide for every want of Sunday school teachers. They will seek the plan which they believe will prove most acceptable to the largest number and will leave wide latitude for independent lessons by local schools and individual teachers. Any scheme which aims to be of world-wide use must be of the simplest character. Some persons will doubtless prefer to prepare their own courses of study, while some who will use the International lessons will supplement them with others. If any plans should thus develop superior to those of the committee, the value of such plans will doubtless soon be discovered and they will be extensively adopted.

On the whole, it seems to us probable that the general plan hitherto pursued will be continued. Passages of Scripture covering the main portions of Bible history will be selected, and lesson writers will make such use of these passages as they find to be most helpful in studying the Bible. It is quite possible that the biographical element will be made more prominent than hitherto. A separate or a related primary course may perhaps be found feasible. Beyond that any addition would imperil the International system. Prof. M. B. Riddle, in a very suggestive letter to the committee, summed up the objections to an advanced course, after presenting the arguments in its favor, by saying that such a step would meet "the danger of the whole scheme of International lessons breaking down from its own weight. In America so many good enterprises fail from attempting too many things that I fear for the result in this case. The arrangement of this supplementary course would be the hardest task the committee have undertaken; it would, if carried out, probably provoke vastly more criticism than even the present scheme."

THE SOUTH AFRICAN SITUATION

Trouble evidently is brewing in South Africa. The indications are that, unless European conditions make it impossible for England to engage in a struggle with the Transvaal at present, a crisis in that region will soon occur. The English are accumulating material for war near the Transvaal frontier, troops are being ordered to South Africa from England and India, and it is even reported that a considerable force of men has been sent into the Transvaal, nominally as miners, but actually to stir up an insurrection.

If it be true, as declared, that the Orange Free State and the Transvaal have formed a federal union, the result will be to almost double the forces which the English will have to meet. Moreover, they are no mean foes. Although they lack discipline they are brave and persistent, they will be fighting in defense of their own soil, and their skill with the rifle is proverbial. England will have a difficult task to conquer them.

Furthermore, although the English miners and others in the Dutch territory can be depended upon to sympathize with the expected invaders, the Dutch in the English colonies will generally support the Boers with equal zeal. Ties of race and blood will largely determine allegiance. The Dutch, too, can count upon the moral support of Germany, which also undoubtedly stands ready to supply material aid so far as this can be done surreptitiously.

The Transvaal government recently has taken two extreme measures which indicate its sense of the gravity of the situation. One is the putting of the judiciary under the direct control of the authorities. The other is the suppression of the Star and the Critic, two Johannesburg journals. Such arbitrary procedure seems both unjust and unwise at this distance, but the latter step may be justified by the conditions. They certainly reveal the firmness with which the Boer government means to meet threatening perils.

It is a pity that these difficulties are not to be settled by arbitration. To do so probably would be exceedingly difficult, partly because the English and the Boers represent policies and purposes so radically different and hostile, and partly because feeling already runs so high on each side that neither people is likely to remain quiet long until one has beaten the other thoroughly. The Boers probably would conquer British South Africa alone easily, and the latter with England behind her will not find victory easy. But, unless England is so hampered by difficulties elsewhere as to be unable to exert her real strength, she probably will win in the end. The plea of protecting Englishmen who are being wronged is an evident pretense. The whole business is the more lamentable because England's prime motive plainly is to gain territory in which are valuable mines.

IMPATIENCE WITH GOD'S WAYS

It is not beautiful or commendable but sometimes it is less blameworthy than it seems. Of course to oppose one's own judgment of what is best to the divine judgment is as wicked as it is absurd. But this is not deliberately done very often. Sometimes we are discontented, annoyed and perhaps afraid. Evil consequences seem destined to result from indicated methods of action. We shrink back and hold ourselves aloof, or try to, from the plain path of duty. Such impatience as this is only to be condemned and that sternly.

But there is an impatience which proceeds from the fact that we are puzzled and confused. We are willing, so far as we are conscious of our own hearts, to do the will of God, or to bear it, as the case may be. But we want to be assured that it is really the divine will which has ordered our circumstances. Many a one of us who does not question the rightful sovereignty of God, nevertheless sometimes feels that—in spite of prayers for guidance which had the right to expect answer, and of efforts so honest and earnest that it seems as if God could not consistently allow them to come to naught—his best and holiest endeavors have accomplished little or nothing. In consequence our lives are out of joint and comparatively fruitless. Impatience due to this cause is peculiarly disheartening and, although blameworthy, by no means the most culpable.

Then there is the impatience due to excess of zeal. We want to hurry God. We long for immediate answers to prayer and rewards for endeavor. We cannot wait for the slow movement of events and the gradual working out of policies. We are so enthusiastic for our Master that we want to take from his hands the reins of power and urge on the desired consummations at once. But that would mean disaster and sorrow. He understands this although we may not. Yet such impatience, we can well believe, is not wholly evil in his sight, mischievous although its results often are.

In either and every case the needed lesson is the same—that of simple, sturdy, obedient faith in God. Doubtless he so often brings us face to face with blank walls, so to speak, on purpose to teach us that we must stop expecting to understand and settle everything for ourselves and be content to follow his lead. No other lesson, at any rate, is more vitally important to us than that.

CURRENT HISTORY

"The Rights of the Many"

It is interesting to note that the majority and minority opinions of the Federal Supreme Court in the case of the United States versus the Trans-Missouri Freight Association are both very much concerned with the duty of so legislating and so interpreting legislation as to guard the rights of the many and restrict the privileges and opportunities of the few. And while railway officials and labor leaders are deciding just how far-reaching is the scope of the majority opinion, and while preparations are being made for a prompt hearing of a similar case in order that the court may either reverse its decision or expound it more definitely and more weightily, perhaps it may be well to call attention to this significant fact. For since the income tax decision of the court it has been severely condemned by individuals and political parties as the portion of our body politic least sensitive to the demands of social, industrial democracy. But now five of the nine justices say of trusts:

> A change from stagecoaches and canal boats to railroads threw at once a large number of men out of employment; changes from hand labor to that of machinery, and from operating machinery by hand to the application of steam for such purpose, leave behind them for the time a number of men who must seek other avenues of livelihood. These are misfortunes which seem to be the necessary accompaniment of all great industrial changes. . . . It is wholly different, however, when such changes are effected by combinations of capital, whose purpose in combining is to control the production or manufacture of any particular article in the market, and by such control dictate the price at which the article shall be sold, the effect being to drive out of business all the small dealers in the commodity and to render the public subject to the decision of the combination as to what price shall be paid for the article. In this light it is not material that the price of an article may be lowered. It is in the power of the combination to raise it, and the result in any event is unfortunate for the country, by depriving it of the services of a large number of small, but independent, dealers who were familiar with the business and who had spent their lives in it, and who supported themselves and their families from the small profits realized therein. Whether they be able to find other avenues to earn their livelihood is not so material, because it is not for the real prosperity of any country that such changes should occur which result in transferring an independent business man, the head of his establishment, small though it might be, into a mere servant or agent of a corporation for selling the commodities which he once manufactured or dealt in, having no voice in shaping the business policy of the company and bound to obey orders issued by others. Nor is it for the substantial interests of the country that any one commodity should be within the sole power and subject to the sole will of one powerful combination of capital.

This is exactly the argument that we heard Rev. Dr. Washington Gladden use in 1889 in assailing trusts. The truth the court seems to teach is that we have made or can make a fetich of "cheapness"; and that no one man, even though he be as pious or philanthropic as Mr. Rockefeller, can distribute the inordinate profits that come from monopoly as advantageously or wisely as would the many men with moderate profits who, but for the monopoly, might still be administrators of substantial properties.

Congressional Action

The debate in the House on the tariff has proceeded relentlessly, not without exciting episodes and significant utterances, to be sure, but still relentlessly toward the hour on March 31 when it will be passed in substantially the form recommended by the Ways and Means Committee. In response to the caustic criticism of the educators and artists of the country, there already have been some modifications in those sections of the bill, but not as many as there should be unless we are prepared to take the reactionary position that individuals seeking information and stimulus for the higher intellectual life, and finding it in books and pictures made abroad, must be taxed because of their aspirations. Debate on the economic aspects of the bill has crystallized more about details than principles, more about the effect of the bill in fostering trusts than in its effect on our Federal revenue. Few have arisen to discuss the ethical bearings of the law, or to reassert the theories for which Mr. Cleveland stood and held Democracy to for twelve years. In fact, the younger men of the South, Populists or Democrats, now accept protection as a fact if not as a principle, and seem bent on securing for their section some of its real or alleged benefits.

The attack on the civil service merit system made by Senators Allen of Nebraska and Gallinger of New Hampshire, and partially indorsed by Senator Hawley of Connecticut, is welcomed by the Civil Service Commission, for they are eager to put the exact facts before the Senate Committee and the country. The law itself is not in peril from foes without, but the method of its administration by too zealous friends in the last Administration is causing somewhat of a reaction against it now, and there is ever the danger that those who gain office by the law's provisions will seek to use their united power in shaping legislation fostering their own pecuniary interests.

Senator Hoar's bill, forbidding kinetoscope reproductions of prize fights in the District of Columbia and the Territories, has been reported favorably to the Senate by the judiciary committee.

The Arbitration Treaty

If latest reports from Washington are to be believed the treaty will fail to be ratified in any form, owing to the opposition of some of the newly elected senators who have been reckoned as its friends, and despite the disposition of the Executive to pass it in any form, even its original. This is disheartening news, for we cannot agree with those who prefer to see the treaty fall by the way rather than have it pass in an amended form, for as reported by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to this Senate, though amended, it still had vitality and scope enough to make it a far-reaching, beneficent act. If it fails to pass in some form we shall suffer loss of self-respect and reputation abroad, but our friends in Great Britain must not be too censorious. Great Britain's official policy toward Crete, her present truculent and overbearing attitude toward the Transvaal Republic in South Africa and her persistent strengthening of naval and military strongholds which threaten our shores and boundaries all have weight with our legislators—naturally and justly, too—and if the treaty fails to be ratified it will not be solely because the senators are short-sighted or lovers of war. Neither will it be, as the British Weekly intimates, because they are afraid of arbitration or because they expect to threaten Great Britain with war. It will be because they distrust British diplomacy dictated by selfish usurers, and because they refuse to make any alliance—even one nominally conserving peace—so long as solemn treaties are set aside by Great Britain whenever it fosters the interests of those who hold her consols or who wish to develop coveted foreign territory. When the plain people of Great Britain once more dictate her foreign policy then an arbitration treaty with Great Britain will be more acceptable to our legislators, and will be more likely to be ratified.

The Manitoba Settlement

The ratification of the Laurier compromise by the Manitoba legislature last week puts the Manitoba sectarian school question on a basis which may either add to or may lessen the complications of Mgr. Merry Del Val, the papal delegate to Canada, who arrived there this week. So far as the Laurier ministry is concerned this matter is closed. But the other and more important matter of the right of Catholics to act with a party which is responsible for settling this Manitoba school problem will immediately call for some action and formulated policy by the papal delegate, as by-elections for federal legislators in two Quebec districts come off April 13, and the bishop of Three Rivers, Mgr. Lafleche, is busy coercing his laity and dictating what they shall do, namely, renounce Liberalism and support the Conservative candidates. In another matter, namely, the selection of Cardinal Taschereau's successor as Canada's representative in the college of cardinals, the papal delegate must, whether he will or no, form opinions and cast his influence. On the whole, the papal delegate has no sinecure.

There are some signs of a renewal of hostilities between the liberal and ultramontane factions of the Roman Catholic Church in this country, Professor Schroeder of the Catholic University at Washington having attacked his liberal colleagues and the school which they represent in a virulent pamphlet; and from Rome come rumors of efforts to bring Bishop Keane to trial for implied charges against Archbishop Corrigan of New York.

Japan, Hawaii and the United States

The law putting Japan on the gold basis has passed through Parliament and gone to the Mikado for the ratification which it surely will receive. Though there is some dissent in the vernacular press and among academic bimetallists, the drift of public opinion—foreign and native—is with the ministry, most of them supporting the step as one necessary and timely and part of Japan's inevitable program if she is to be the power which her ambition drives her on to be. The Japanese-Russian agreement respecting Korea shows that Japan has gracefully accepted the inevitable and, nominally at least, acquiesces in virtual Russian supremacy. The foreign policy of Japan, as set forth by Count Okuma, called for conquest of territory in the Pacific by process of emigration to strategically situated islands and slow but sure crowding out of native populations and present rulers. This was sure to bring her into conflict with Spain or the United States sooner or later, and there are those who think that the crisis with respect to Hawaii and the United States is near at hand. Among those who think so is ex-Secretary of State John W. Foster, who visited Hawaii last summer. In an address given in Washington last week he urged immediate annexation of Hawaii by the United States, and gave such reasons for his contention as will take more than sneers at his motives by the Boston Herald to refute. Japanese officials here deny that the situation in Hawaii is as critical as Mr. Foster implies, and they deny any disposition of Japan to extend territorially; but facts are facts, and they have been set before the Administration in such a way by responsible Hawaiian officials lately that it is thought that Mr. McKinley will soon send a message to Congress urging immediate Hawaiian annexation, not by treaty but by Congress enacting the same in a joint resolution, which already has been introduced in the House.

The Blockade of Crete

The blockade of Crete continues, but that of Greece has not been ordered, for Great Britain will not consent to it. It has lasted long enough to prove that it will not move Greece from her position; that a cordon of battleships and detachments of marines cannot restore or maintain order in the port towns, much less in the interior; that the Turkish garrisons are not safe from the Cretan attacks even when protected by men-of-war; and that the only result of the blockade thus far has been to encourage conflict between Christians and Moslems and starve the Christians of the interior. This failure has been admitted in a joint note of the admirals, in which they frankly state that if Greek troops are to be forced to withdraw then so must the Turkish.

The Greek crown prince has started for Thessaly to take command in person of the Greek forces, and whether his purpose be restraint or incitement his departure for the front indicates in an unmistakable way that Greece will not substantially change her position, for she could not if she would. The die has been cast, and as we go to press war on the frontier of Thessaly impends.

The United States and the Cretan Blockade

While it is true that no vessel flying the stars and stripes entered Cretan ports last year, it is also true that if the United States accepts the notice of the "pacific blockade" without protest she hereafter may be cited as indorsing a policy at variance not only with the general interpretation of international law, but peculiarly alien to her historic policy respecting the right of search on the high seas. Moreover, a dissent from us now would have tremendous moral effect in aiding the Cretans and encouraging the Greeks, and failure to so dissent will have a corresponding depressing effect. Rarely does an administration have an opportunity to so maintain national dignity and at the same time succor aspiring humanity. If no protest is made, then it is to be hoped that a direct issue may be made by some bold Yankee skipper sailing into Cretan waters and testing the truth of Mr. Curzon's statement in the House of Commons last week that American as well as British merchantmen are debarred from Cretan waters.

The Attitude of the Powers

Russia, apparently, is the most stolid foe that Greece faces. Her hand is being forced and she resents it. Pro-Greek public opinion in Germany begins to crystallize and has found expression in the Reichstag, but thus far Germany has stood with Russia. The French and Italian peoples sympathize freely with the Greeks and so do their officials, but the latter naturally hesitate about suddenly deserting old allies for new. Yet it cannot be for naught that Queen Victoria and President Faure have so studiously complimented the other recently, or that Lord Salisbury and M. Honataux have compared notes in person. Lord Salisbury still has a majority in the House of Commons who will indorse him, as was proved last week by a vote taken after John Morley and Sir Charles Dilke had criticised the British policy, but his secrecy as to his actual position is alienating many of his own party followers, and all the time the tide of public opinion is rising. It would swamp him should he decide to use British men and guns in ejecting the Greeks from Crete or in punishing Greece for her contumacy.

The Massacres of Armenians at Tokat

It was inevitable that the sultan and his minions should infer from the Cretan policy of the Powers that a free hand to massacre Armenians had been given. Hence it was not surprising to learn that in the town of Tokat near Sivas sanguinary conflicts had been renewed, in which 700 Armenians perished. But in permitting this idea to get abroad the sultan erred tactically, and the Tokat massacre accentuated the blunder. The Powers at once were forced to remonstrate emphatically. Sir Phillip Currie, the British minister, expressing his displeasure in a tone which could not be misunderstood, one implying that whatever other Powers might do Great Britain would not tolerate another reign of horror in Armenia. As the consequence of this Hakki Pasha, commander of the troops at Tokat, has been dismissed from office and arrested, and Great Britain and Russia are to be represented in the investigation which has been ordered. Rumors of war, of course, have added much to the uncertainties and dangers of our Christian missionaries in Turkey, and war itself would make their situation critical. Minister Terrell already has called on the sultan to insure their safety.

NOTES

Charlemagne Tower, Jr., of Philadelphia has been nominated as minister to Austria, and Henry Clay Evans of Tennessee to be commissioner of pensions. Mr. Tower is a man of wealth and education but no experience in diplomacy.

Water was the beverage at the first state dinner in the White House, and will be, save when foreign diplomats are the guests. The Hayeses were more consistent and drew no distinctions between foreigners and natives. But "half a loaf is better than none."

President McKinley is finding it difficult to select a commissioner of Indian affairs who will satisfy the spoilsmen, the reformers, the A. P. A. and the Roman Catholics. Concerning one of the candidates a Washington dispatch asserts that he has selected the post because it will "give him an opportunity to retain his grip on South Dakota politics and place him in line for the Senate." Mr. McKinley cannot afford to select such a man.

The House judiciary committee of the Massachusetts legislature has reported unanimously against the petition of Charles P. Mills of Newburyport (Rev. Mr. Mills, a member of the House) for a change in the laws in order to give one rest day in seven to working people. The petitioner was not the author of the petition, but it came really from the labor committee of the Congregational Association of Massachusetts. It is said on the side of the committee that the petitioners had only the support of some labor leaders on their side, while there were thousands of laboring men in remonstrance, representing that such an act as was proposed would cut them off from a material part of their livelihood, and that it would be much against the interests of labor to have the bill passed. The committee had no difficulty in reaching a conclusion, and the expectation is that their adverse report will be accepted by both branches of the legislature without a contest. The House has passed to be engrossed, with no debate on its final stage, the bill which permits the railroad commissioners to use their discretion in permitting the running of steamboats on Sundays.

IN BRIEF

Who shall say that athletics maintain an undisputed sway at our colleges when two such recent events as the admirable rendering of the Antigone at Drury and the Harvard-Yale debate can be cited?

The editor of the Pennsylvania Methodist, who charged the superintendent of public grounds at Harrisburg with accepting bribes from contractors, has been found guilty of criminal libel by a jury of the vicinage. He has appealed to a higher court.

The church in Logiealmond (Drumtochty) has called a U. P. probationer, Rev. J. E. McOuat, a good student and earnest preacher. But is he hospitable, and will he suffer meekly the questions and comparisons of innumerable visitors who love Ian Maclaren?

The Advance says, "It is sentimental pietism that displays the shocking cruelty of dashing the little ones against the stones." And yet we are sure that our contemporary would not recommend the practice of such treatment of babes, even in order to support its view of inspiration.

Professor Sterrett of Amherst, now in Athens, says, "The Parthenon is doomed." And why? Strangely enough for reasons that make many of our modern buildings but mere mockeries. "In point of fact the builders of the Parthenon employed first-class marble only . . . where the eye could see it," he says. Thus, even over the fairest product of Grecian art lieth the trail of fraud.

Baroness Hirsch, widow of the great Jewish financier and philanthropist, is to spend $1,500,000 in New York city erecting trade schools and model houses for the tenement house district folk, and ex-Mayor Grace of New York city, a Roman Catholic, announces his intention to spend $200,000 in establishing a training school for young girls and women in the same city. God bless them!

Just what did Governor Wolcott mean last week by congratulating the Baptist Young People's Union on belonging to a denomination which "established the great Sunday school agency and organized the great Christian Endeavor movement"? We cheerfully yield to our Baptist brethren the honor of rearing Robert Raikes, but we have a faint impression that Father Endeavor Clark is affiliated with a body of Christians known as Congregationalists.

Our London editor has given us a graphic and instructive account of the recent Free Church Congress in that city. Though his report is not wanting in superlatives, we have no reason to doubt that the assembly was one of the most important that has ever convened in the world's capital. The references to it in the English papers show how consequential it was in the eyes of competent observers on the ground. In view of the special interest in theological discussions now going forward on this side of the Atlantic, the position as respects doctrine which this representative body of Nonconformists took is all the more significant. The emphasis placed upon the divinity of Christ is particularly reassuring.

Charles Eliot, the eldest son of President Eliot of Harvard, the most eminent young landscape artist in this country, died last week. Though a very young man, he has left behind him in the park system of greater Boston a monument of perennial beauty. How rare a man he was may be inferred from the following minute, passed by men who had stood with him in the fight to save for the public the beautiful and historic portions of Massachusetts territory:

> Charles Eliot found in this community a generous, but helpless, sentiment for the preservation of our historical and beautiful places. By ample knowledge, by intelligent perseverance, by elcquent teaching, he created organizations capable of accomplishing his great purposes, and inspired others with a zeal approaching his own.

The London Daily News, which, "at the hazard of its own life and at immense pecuniary loss, supported the North in the Civil War" and has ever been the friend of liberty, for some unaccountable reason has been "the chief traitor to the cause of Cretan liberty"—to quote the British Weekly—during the past few weeks, and unfortunately the reason assigned for its attitude is the reason which so often controls the utterances of many of our ablest journals—namely, dictation from the counting-room. The same men who have made the News defend Cecil Rhodes find it advantageous to use it as a club to beat back those who put honor higher than prosperity. The trail of the plutocrat is beginning to be seen in English as well as in French, German and American journalism. The Saturday Review has just been purchased by one of Cecil Rhodes's partners in South African exploitation solely in order that its fire against Rhodes might be stopped.

The New York Presbytery has been for some time agitated over the application of Herman Warszawiak for membership in that body. His cause has been urged by Rev. Dr. John Hall, Dr. D. J. Burrill and others, while Rev. Dr. A. F. Schauffler and others have insisted that he was unworthy of membership. Warszawiak was for a time employed by the New York City Mission Society, of which Dr. Schauffler is secretary, but left it more than two years ago. Last week the society issued a public notice of his wrongdoing, claiming to have abundant proof and warning the public against him. He was followed by detectives who testified that they saw him enter gambling houses and places of ill repute. On being charged with this evildoing he denied it, but being shown photographs of himself entering these places he confessed. He is an eloquent speaker, has charge of a mission for converted Jews and has extensively solicited contributions and received much money.

Those who recall with admiration the effective work which Henry Norman did for the London Chronicle in Washington, when our relations with Great Britain were so strained in 1896, will be glad to know that he is now doing work of a similar grade for the Chronicle as its correspondent in Athens. It may not be generally known that he was educated for the Unitarian ministry and graduated Bachelor of Divinity at the Harvard Divinity School. His wife is a granddaughter of Robert Chambers, the Edinburgh editor and publisher. Mr. Norman thus paraphrases the reply of Greece to the Powers:

> Underneath the studied phrases of diplomacy these words may be discovered: "You are liars, you have lied and lied—to Crete and to me. Your promises are as the wind, your new scheme of 'autonomy' is as the dust column it raises in the desert. I spit upon your promises. Let your cannons speak to me as they did to the Christians of Halepa. They tell no lies. Where the mighty are cowards and liars, the weak must act, even if they perish. Keep at least your tardy promises of coercion, and I will throw the torch into the powder magazine upon which you stand!"

Large space in the British papers, which arrived last Monday, is given to the career and character of Professor Drummond. Naturally the British Weekly, whose editor, Dr. W. R. Nicoll, was an intimate friend of Professor Drummond's, surpasses most of its contemporaries in the comprehensiveness of its survey. Dr. Nicoll's own tribute, while disclaiming sympathy with Drummond on certain theological points, speaks with highest praise of the purity and charm of his character. "He never showed," says Dr. Nicoll, "that he had himself experienced the agonies and travail of religious conflict, but no one was more familiar with the battles and defeats of his fellows. He was always willing to hear and to help and to give, but he himself never asked anything, never seemed to need anything, so far as one could see had nothing to grieve over in the past and nothing to fear for in the future, nothing to turn for to any friend save to his Saviour, Christ." Rev. Joseph Agnew, a Free Church minister, writing in the Christian Commonwealth, says, "In repose there was a certain wistful unworldliness about his face and a far-away look in his beautiful eyes such as you see only in those who live near God." The Christian World secured from Dr. R. F. Horton a tribute which begins with these words, "What a sob at the heart it brings to learn that Drummond is dead." The mysterious disease which for two years has baffled the physicians of Great Britain and the Continent seemed about Christmas time to be at last yielding to treatment, but two or three weeks before his death he caught cold, and though he grew better a relapse a week before his death caused his friends to abandon all hope. Singularly enough the news of his death reached his friends in Glasgow just as they were assembling for the funeral of Professor Candlish.

THE FUNERAL OF PROFESSOR DRUMMOND

BY REV. J. S. VOORHEES

Stirling, the home of the late Professor Drummond, where his mother and two brothers now reside, a town of 16,000 persons, is one of the most interesting places historically in Scotland. From its elevated castle, 220 feet above the extensive plain which surrounds it on every side, kings and queens have watched their fortunes as they were staked in battle. Eight important battlefields are in sight. The history is clearly authentic, and the marks are so plain that the natural play of the imagination brings before the eyes the blood-stained fields and streams and to the ears the clash of arms on the fields of Stirling Bridge and Bannockburn.

On March 15, 1897, Stirling saw a different sight. A gentle messenger of peace and love has given a new interest and glory to his native town. Under the eaves of Old Greyfriars Church, whose walls are pitted with bullet marks from many a fierce battle of past centuries, the body of Henry Drummond was laid to rest. The clouds hung heavy while professors, clergymen and students from far and near came to stand with bowed heads around his grave and cover it with flowers.

The funeral services, held in the Free North Presbyterian Church, of which he was a member, were brief, simple and touching. They were conducted by close friends who knew his heart, and nothing could have been more fitting. Dr. James Stalker invoked in a few words the presence and blessing of God, and all sang together the favorite hymn of Professor Drummond:

> O God, our help in ages past,
> Our hope for years to come.

Prof. George Adam Smith read with deep feeling from the Old Testament of the love that bound together David and Jonathan and the 23d Psalm. Professor Charteris of the University of Edinburgh in a quiet manner and in beautiful words led in prayer, giving thanks to God for the endowments with which he had enriched the departed one, for the pure white light of his life and for the abiding blessing he brought to men; and the blessing of God was invoked upon the thousands of students to whom he had given a nobler purpose in life by his own manliness, by the purity of his faith in God and the lesson of his own dedication to Christ.

Dr. Stalker read from a large number of telegrams received only three, all from America, expressing sympathy with friends and gratitude for so useful a life. The congregation then sang the last hymn sung by Professor Drummond. The Sunday evening before his death a friend played on the organ and sang the hymn:

> I'm not ashamed to own my Lord,
> Or to defend his cause.

Then Prof. George Adam Smith read 1 Cor. 13, and brought out all the beauty which Professor Drummond had taught us to see in that marvelous passage. Dr. Alexander Whyte of Edinburgh led in a closing prayer, in a sentence praising God for the assurance that out of great tribulation, with robes made white in the blood of the Lamb, the departed one is now before the throne of God.

Prof. A. B. Bruce of Glasgow pronounced the benediction, and a long procession of loving friends followed the casket to the old historic cemetery on Castle Hill, where it was placed in the ground before the Greek cross that marks his father's tomb. The procession was headed by the Boys' Brigades of the town, followed by the relatives and friends, after whom were professors and students, then the provost, magistrates and town council, followed by visiting clergymen and other friends. The coffin was carried on the shoulders of eight students of the Glasgow Divinity Hall of the Free Church, who were pupils of Professor Drummond. As the casket was lowered into the grave the students sang softly the first stanza of the hymn, "O God, our help in ages past," which Professor Drummond had made dear to them.

During the gathering of the people and until the close of the service at the grave the bell of the town hall was tolled, and all the shops were closed. The street from the church to the cemetery was filled with people, who joined in or watched the procession to the grave. The plate on the coffin had this inscription:

HENRY DRUMMOND,
Born August 17th, 1851.
Died March 11th, 1897.

On Sunday Prof. Marcus Dods preached a memorial sermon in the church in Stirling. It was a beautiful tribute to a remarkable life. The power of it was due to his entire subjection to Christ as his Lord and Master. Heaven is enriched forever by his going home.

PROFESSOR DRUMMOND

A COLLEAGUE'S AFFECTIONATE WORD

A private letter just received from Prof. George Adam Smith of Glasgow is so full of feeling for his beloved friend that we are sure we shall be pardoned for sharing a portion of the letter with our readers.

Do you know what Professor Drummond effected for America here? He always came back from you enthusiastic, both about your nation's achievements and possibilities. No man has done more to create among my contemporaries a knowledge of America and a sympathy with her people. A great part of his love was with you. When I stayed with him I used to see twice a week the American mail come in with a heap of letters, not from societies and persons in official positions, but from individual men and women of the crowd whom his words had reached in some American city or whom he had helped personally by his counsel and comfort. Some of these letters required no answer (as some of course deserved none), but he had no greater pleasure than in being able, in other cases, to send back advice or stimulus to decision, or comfort in pain. I am sure he is being mourned in very many places across the Atlantic.

I have known him for twenty-two years, since he was a Senior student and I was a Junior. I have never heard him say an angry word or a harsh word about man or woman, or a foolish word; have seen him pass through the two greatest tests our characters can be subjected to—on the one side that immense blaze of popularity, as well as favor from the rich and eminent, which broke out after the publication of his first book, and on the other side the pain and helplessness of those last two years, and through both of those extremes he has remained the same gentle, humble soul whom we loved in student days. He was the purest, sweetest spirit I ever knew.

Of course he had his detractors. He could not have been the unconventional, simple servant of God that he was without having such. But I don't believe he ever had an enemy.

THE OUTCOME OF MARY LYON DAY

How far has the expectation of the trustees of Mt. Holyoke College been realized by the special appeal of Sunday, Feb. 28? is the question of its many friends. The pastors in various sections of the country responded heartily to the request made to set before their people the work of Mary Lyon and the need of money to meet the present emergency. But the visible result is not encouraging. The larger churches have not been heard from save in isolated instances. As in the early history of the institution, the country churches have responded more generously. Mr. Rockefeller has given $40,000 for a building. Dr. Pearsons has been an inspiration, not only in his gifts, but by personal appeal and influence. But it is to be feared that the plans of the trustees, who dare not run in debt, and yet who, of all others, feel the pressure for another dormitory and for needed buildings to carry on the work of the college, must be modified to the detriment of the cause. Not only must there be erected buildings for the students, but in these days, when science is moving with rapid steps, the college must be equipped to meet the demand. A "plant house" is no longer a simple place to raise flowers, and a source of pleasure to the visitor, but it is absolutely indispensable to every botanical teacher. A gymnasium is today a necessary adjunct of the college.

Owing to the fire and the erection of new buildings it will be necessary to move and enlarge the library that a reading-room now occupying an inconvenient place may be under the same roof. This involves a cost of ten to fifteen thousand dollars. Moreover, a building estimated to cost thirty or forty thousand dollars will require twenty or twenty-five per cent. more to make it ready for the student.

For the "endowment fund" Dr. Pearsons considers $200,000, the amount originally asked for, a very low sum. He sees now that with the new buildings scattered about, with the curriculum of a first-class college, not less than $300,000 should be raised to keep the "board and tuition" at its present low rate, and hence offers to give $1,000 for every $2,000 raised, in addition to his other gifts and promises. In regard to giving he humorously remarks, "I like my trade well, but I have hard work to make the average man see the importance of giving when alive." And he and his large-hearted wife are desirous of seeing the great West aroused to the joy of giving.

THE BIBLE AND SIMON THE ZEALOT

BY REV. FRANK R. SHIPMAN, ANDOVER

The Simon the Zealot to whom I refer is an old man, though he is not nineteen hundred years old. He lives in America, not in Judea. His principal fanaticism was abolition, not the Mosaic law. I say his "principal" fanaticism, for he has had others and is really covered by scars obtained in battling for liberty, equality and brotherhood. He was ever a good fighter, though personally a gentle man; and age has not made him less valiant for truth, while it may have made him a shade more reflective on the width of truth's boundaries.

The other day I found him musing, with a magazine fallen from his grasp to the floor. As I picked it up I noticed that it was open at an article entitled The Bible Newly Discovered To Be Literature. "Yes," he said, following my glance, "that's what I've been reading." For full 120 seconds he relapsed into thought again. Meantime I waited patiently, certain that after this interval of quiescence Simon's intermittent spring of talk would flow vigorously. Nor was I disappointed, although at the end of the two minutes I had taken up the essay and had become absorbed in an instructive passage describing how interesting is the genealogy of the dukes of Edom under the new light.

"The way of it is this," Simon went on to say. "Religious truth may be looked at in one of two ways—either as given by God to men, or as discovered by men in their aspiration toward God. According to the first view, God's grace, his promises, his help come to men in their time of need. He is the object of adoration and thanksgiving. According to the other view, man is the central object of thought. His struggles Godward, his repentances, vows, doubts, gropings toward the Light constitute the great interest. The one view inspires us with trust, because—in regard to the Bible, for example—we feel that we stand upon a firm foundation of divine revelation; the other view inspires us with courage, because we feel—as in the Bible, we will say—the inspiration of other men's faith.

"Now for me, I take my stand on this, that the best gifts, and the Bible among them, were given by God to men. It's in my veins to look at things in that way. Our ancestors were Calvinists, Puritans. They didn't talk about 'struggling up to God.' They believed that all they needed to do was to keep still, and then they would hear the Lord speak and they would see him face to face. I didn't discover that slavery was wrong. God told me, in his goodness and in the fullness of his time; and after that, why, I knew how Garrison felt, saying, 'I am in earnest.' Now, young brother, the instinct that truth comes down from God, rather than is climbed up to by men, is rubbed deep into Americans. It is in their blood. And whenever they exchange it for this other form of faith, they are uneasy because they feel that they have exchanged their religion for a superfine kind of humanitarianism.

"That's where my quarrel is with these Bible-as-literature people. They mean all right. In fact, I only wish they had begun earlier. If they had taught us a little sooner that one must not draw on the Bible for proof texts hit or miss, we should not have heard so much about returning Onesimus to his owner, or 'servants, obey your masters.' But men like this one here"—he laid his hand on the author of The Bible Newly Discovered—"irritate me because they seem to have drifted into a merely literary, æsthetic frame of mind. They blaze with enthusiasm for Isaiah's vision, but they are looking at Isaiah, not at Him whom Isaiah saw. They are eager in their advocacy of the Bible, but they're not reverent. They joggle the ark of God so much that they wear on my nerves.

"You youngsters have got to go through this, I suppose, but I hope that you will go clean through it and come out on the other side. For example, read the prophecies of Jeremiah, as this man wants you to do. Locate each prophecy in its proper reign, and saturate your soul with poor, patriotic, heroic Jeremiah's effort to stay the lightnings of God from guilty Judah; but keep reading until, having formed a mental image of the white-heated prophet, you can forget him again and can hear the Lord God, the same today that ever he was. Keep reading till Jeremiah is only the mouthpiece, and his words are the rebuking, exhorting, denouncing, striving words of God himself to any backsliding man or people.

"Perhaps it is the New Testament that you would rather be reading. Well, the same truth holds there—even more urgently so. For instance, in reading the gospel according to Luke as the absorbed student of a human life, you will notice how the shadow of the cross fell upon Jesus. You will notice the change in his views, the difference in the spirit of his ministry. You will see that his deeds of power grew less frequent, that he gave himself more to speech, varying ever 'those words of eternal life from which all ages learn divinest wisdom.' He was steadfast as before, but less joyous, more earnest and insistent on 'seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness.'

"It is interesting to know this about the life of Jesus, but, remember, it does not necessarily make you more truly his to know it. It may cheat you with a merely sentimental appreciation of his character. If there is one thing more odious than another, it is a lackadaisical patronage of 'the sweet life lived in Galilee.' Press on. Know Him. Let your very soul hear him say, 'Ye cannot serve God and Mammon.' I don't deprecate scientific study of the Bible. On the contrary, faith, from its own impulse and for its own sake, must needs use historical study as a test of its own validity. Only do not become entangled in your study. Rise up to the 'little child's' faith again."

Simon had talked for some time, and I felt that it was my turn to speak. I recrossed my legs uneasily. "But," said I, "when I'm trying to find out whether David or a Maccabean Jew wrote a certain psalm, and trying to appreciate the beauty of the poetry, I can't very well think of God as speaking in it to men."

"That's just what I said," he rejoined. "As a matter of fact I believe you could work through that stage, and come out all the richer on the other side; but I say that, if you are not sure of working through, you would better not begin."

He took from his breast pocket a little worn copy of the book of Psalms, as he said these last words. He opened it and then read in low, reverent tones:

"As the heaven is high above the earth, so great is his mercy toward them that fear him.

"As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us.

"Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him.

"God inspired those words," he said; "he who does not believe it has not yet touched the hem of the garment of the Bible."

IMPRESSIONS OF LIFE AT THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

BY G. P. M.

The site of our national capital was not selected by Congress as the result of careful comparison and deliberate conviction that it was a fit place. It was the outcome of a bargain between Hamilton and Jefferson, in short, a log-rolling scheme, in which Hamilton outwitted Jefferson. But Hamilton gained thereby enough votes to intrench in our political code a principle of government of incalculable value and undiminished vitality. Washington, today, in theory is not the place, geographically speaking, for the national capital, nor will it ever be the best place of abode climatically for the ever increasing army of officials. But it has grown to be such a beautiful, spacious city, and so much is invested there now, that none are so daring as to suggest a change.

A meliorist will see in the above a parable applicable to the daily course of events in Washington, and never more so than now. He visits the halls of legislation, expecting to find orators and idealists, if you please, whose duty it is to set forth lofty principles if need be, nor is he disappointed altogether, but when he apprehends fully the process by which legislation is produced, the thousand and one conflicting interests that have to be consulted and the mixed motives that govern the best of men, he ceases to marvel that our legislators move so slowly, or that their product is so far short of the theoretically ideal, or so unmistakably the result of compromise. Yet who will say that, in a day when men have gone daft on the subject of legislation and expect it to be a panacea for everything, it is not fortunate that our legislative mills do grind exceeding slow and small?

Perchance the visitor stands and studies the stream of office seekers and their sponsors that enters the White House doors, and then scans the list of nominations which the President makes, and is not surprised that all of the latter are not ideal. He realizes how terrific the pressure upon him is, how dependent he is necessarily upon the word of others, and how strong the feeling of loyalty to and desire to reward personal and party friends must be with one who is much of a man. Yet who will dare to say that any of our recent presidents has constantly prostituted his office-appointing power to further personal or party ends, or persisted in keeping unfit men in high places; or who would desire to have a president totally ungrateful to friends or scornful of the suggestions of men who know local conditions or the qualifications of individuals?

No one who has come in touch with affairs in Washington since the new Administration began can have failed to note that the citizens of the city, the legislators and the would-be officials, are acknowledging the return of an era when they can have natural, democratic dealings with executive officials. They all feel that the President and his Cabinet are of them and not above them. This has brought with it abuses, no doubt, that may soon cause a re-enactment of old regulations, but just now it is an era of good fellowship. The President walks abroad, old friends dine informally with him at the White House, he is not so busy but that he can visit an old army comrade in the hospital, newspaper correspondents are welcomed to the White House, and the public once more can roam freely through the White House grounds. Cabinet officials are accessible to callers and are to be seen at the Capitol conferring with legislators about legislation affecting their departments, and everywhere there is a disposition to be as frank and harmonious as can be, this spirit extending even to the Senate, where hostility to the Executive recently has been most pronounced.

Yet one would make a great mistake if he inferred from this that nothing had been done or said by the Administration or party in power to indicate that it was to be dignified, forceful, constructive. Both Secretaries Gary and Long have already issued orders indicating that there is to be no step backward toward the spoils system in their departments. The President has made the party leaders realize that they must settle all factional disputes before asking him to name officials, and that those who give advice will be held responsible for their counsel.

As for the discipline of the Republican party in the House, the celerity with which the tariff bill was introduced, rules governing its discussion passed and a date for its enactment set they challenge the admiration of those who admire doing even though it be for their own undoing. Precedent and peculiar exigencies are held to justify the summary method of legislation which Speaker Reed, the Committee on Rules and Mr. Dingley and his associates on the Ways and Means Committee have mapped out for the House, but after all is said it remains true that it is a method which savors of autocracy, places undue responsibility and temptation upon too limited a number of men, and depends for its success upon too stern use of the lash of the party whip. Nor does the essential quality of the method change when it is replied that it is our solution of a problem which grows more and more acute in deliberative assemblies the world over.

Mr. Reed's re-election as Speaker of the House was foreordained, and his speech when brought before the House and his manner and bearing when administering the oath to the members indicated that he is not lacking in feeling and a very genuine reverence. Working in harmony with the President, ably supported by such lieutenants as Dingley of Maine, Payne of New York, Henderson of Iowa and Hopkins of Illinois, and backed by a not too unwieldy party majority, he can almost smile with derision on the divided hosts of the Democracy, divided, as events have proved, on tariff as well as monetary issues. Few of those with whom he crossed lances in days past are left on the Democratic side of the House, and the younger, newer men, like Bailey of Texas, the leader of the Democratic minority, and McLaurin of South Carolina, are still inexperienced youths and neophytes compared with the men they must fight. However, did not party discipline demand the use of the Reed rules in passing the Dingley Tariff Bill, it is by no means certain that they in their present form would continue to govern the House. Hepburn of Iowa and Walker of Massachusetts lead a faction in the Republican ranks which chafes under the autocracy of the Speaker and the Committee on Rules, and hopes some day to break it by the substitution of rules permitting greater freedom in initiating legislation and more latitude in debate.

Of veterans the House now has but few marked personalities. Galusha Grow of Pennsylvania, Holman of Indiana, Bland of Missouri and Harmer of Pennsylvania are the chief. Scanning it one is confirmed in the belief that it represents a higher type of American manhood than the United States senators do. With all proper respect for the gentlemen of the latter body, it must be affirmed that, judging them by their faces, their acts and the methods they have employed to gain their places, most of them are not fit occupants of places of such honor and responsibility.

Study of life in a Washington hotel, especially one having as inmates men of authority in an administration, gives clews to personal character and methods of procuring results which are very significant. I shall not soon forget certain scenes in the lives of certain members of the Ways and Means Committee, which I witnessed on the Sunday before the Monday when the tariff bill was introduced in the House. I left the capital convinced that a whisper in the ear is far more potent than any other legitimate argument, and that interests which can afford to send personal representatives to the seat of legislation have a tremendous advantage over those which cannot.

Of one notion, namely that a congressman's life is an easy one, no one can fail to be disabused who studies the situation on the ground. No member who faithfully attends to his correspondence, runs errands for his constituents at the departments and conscientiously studies legislation that comes before him in the committee-room or open forum has much time left for social amenities or loafing. As for the wives and families of legislators who try to keep up family life in hotels and boarding houses, they deserve the public's sympathy. Sensible is that congressman who, like S. J. Barrows of the Massachusetts Tenth District, prefers to have a humble home where mental and moral tonic can be gained and affairs of State and party left outside the threshold.

MAY DAYS IN MARCH

BY A. E. D.

Boston offers to its inhabitants many rare advantages. But its climate in March is not one of them. Yet one may leave its bleak winds at 1 o'clock P. M. and, taking the Cape Charles route, breakfast the next day amid the glories of a May morning, with the music, coming in at open windows, of lapping waves on the sandy beach at Old Point Comfort, Va., where the two great hotels, the Hygeia and the Chamberlain, fulfill the prophecy of those early settlers who gave the place its name in the same year that the Pilgrims left old Boston for Holland. Here one may find enough to interest him in watching the white sails and busy steamboats plying through Hampton Roads; or he may walk around the ramparts of Fortress Monroe, which guards at this point the entrance to the James River; or he may take an electric car and visit the great dry dock at Newport News, where several battle ships are now being constructed. If one would make longer excursions, there are Norfolk, and Portsmouth with its Navy Yard, and historic Jamestown and Yorktown within easy reach, besides Virginia Beach and other winter resorts.

But probably Hampton Institute attracts more of the visitors to Old Point than any other place. It is about fifteen minutes' ride from the hotels by electric cars, and at this season from forty to sixty persons daily are conducted through its shops and school buildings, while some of them find their way over the big farm which is worked by the students. The institution is a most interesting experiment in making leaders for the Negro and Indian races. The impulse of the life of its founder, General Armstrong, is everywhere felt in it. But Dr. Frissell and his able corps of assistants are putting into operation plans much in advance of what the General was able to inaugurate. Dr. Frissell has studied industrial schools and their methods in Europe, having made an extended visit abroad for that purpose last year. He has inverted the former order of studies at Hampton, and makes the academic training introductory to the trades school, which has now been in operation about two years.

Here are about 600 young men and women, carefully selected from Southern Negroes and the various Indian tribes. The young men are organized into companies under military discipline, and both sexes are taught such studies as are included in grammar school grades, with a larger range in physiology, physics and principles of civil government. Then they learn by practice to build and furnish houses, to make homes, to carry on farms, to manage the business of a civilized community. Here is a saw-mill, with all modern improvements, turning out about 35,000 feet of lumber daily. Shoes, clothing, harnesses, wagons and household furniture are produced in considerable quantities. A blacksmith's shop, a printing establishment, a tailor's shop and a dairy are parts of the plant. Some sixteen industries are already represented. A building is about to be erected in which sewing, cooking and other household work will be scientifically taught. In short, these young men and women are being fitted to go back to their people and show them how to live and prosper and be useful citizens. Several thousands of Hampton graduates are already doing this successfully over a wide area of our country.

A picture of life at Hampton is one to be enjoyed and long remembered. Among the visitors to the institute are not a few foreigners, as well as many Americans who are interested in it from a sociological point of view. It has in it the best elements of the college settlement, and is the creator of many such settlements. It is in no sense denominational, but is practically and profoundly religious. Every Sunday morning some 200 of the students go out into the neighboring homes and communities to visit the sick and hold cottage and schoolhouse meetings. The public services at the chapel in the afternoon are always crowded, including many visitors. Rev. E. S. Tead of Somerville, Mass., preached there on Sunday, March 21. The singing of the students, without instrumental accompaniment, is a great attraction. On Sunday evening all the students gather in the large hall, where one very interesting exercise is the singing of plantation melodies and folk songs. Much care is taken to preserve these in their purity; and Hampton is doing a good work in perpetuating these features of the life of these races which might otherwise be lost in the changes which, during the present generation, are so deeply affecting them. These 600 voices, under the skillful guidance of a Negro leader, send forth a volume of harmony as inspiring as it is remarkable.

The institution has received some generous gifts from individuals, and its plant represents considerably more than half a million dollars. The United States Government appropriates $20,000 annually toward the support of the Indian pupils, and the income from property appropriated by the State of Virginia amounts, perhaps, to half as much more. But this pioneer work is expensive. It is opening the way for others to profit by its experiments at less cost. In addition to all its other income, it requires about $80,000 annually to be contributed by its friends. During the last two or three years a heavy task has been laid on Dr. Frissell and his associates to secure this large sum. But Hampton has many enthusiastic supporters, and new ones are added every year, for rarely does a visitor leave it without warm interest in its work and strong faith in its possibilities. Only a few days ago a gentleman from Massachusetts, after inspecting the institution for the first time, left behind him a check for a handsome sum. Boston has made generous investments there and will make many more. And it would be difficult to find a place where money will do more satisfactorily the work which the best people desire to have done for the Negroes and Indians in this country.

DEACON DUDLEY'S SUNDAYS IN BOSTON

VII.

BY ALDEN ENDECOTT

After the exciting Sunday at the People's Temple and Music Hall the deacon did not say much about his plans for another Sunday. Even when he read the notices Saturday evening he made no comment. All this was a sure sign to his wife that Jacob was thinking busily.

"I shouldn't wonder a mite," she mused to herself, "if, as there's a little spring feeling in the air, Jacob's beginning to think he hasn't always put his time to the best use on the Sabbath day. These bright, warm days make anybody think of home, and I guess he feels it. Well, I won't say anything, but I'll just wait and see."

So the wise woman waited till Sunday morning came. The weather was distinctly threatening, and as they were getting ready for breakfast Deacon Dudley looked out the window anxiously several times.

"I'm afraid it's going to storm again," he observed, finally. "I'm sorry, for I hoped you would be able to get out today."

"Where are you thinking of going?" asked Mrs. Dudley, glad that the silence was broken.

"Well, I rather thought we might like to go to Central today. It's near by, and while there's lots of good about these new-fangled churches I guess I'm getting kinder sick of 'em. They say Dr. Clark is a real interesting man."

"Let's see," said his wife; "they made that church all over, didn't they, within a few years? I know she that was Sarah Bisbee wrote to somebody up home about it. She thought it would be such a splendid chance for us to get some pews cheap. She said they spent thousands and thousands of dollars on it. I declare it don't seem right. It must have been well enough before. Was you ever there?"

"Seems to me I went there once to hear Dr. Duryea. Yes, I did, because I remember he wasn't there, and all I can remember was how a great ray of purple and green light struck right on the preacher's face and made him look deathly. I hope they changed the windows."

"Why, it's snowing!" exclaimed Mrs. Dudley, as she straightened up the papers in their room after breakfast. "We're late this morning; can't we go right off before it gets too bad? I want to go. It's only a little way."

So they wrapped up well and hurried along as fast as the blustering wind and snow would allow. Warm, and out of breath, they reached the church and after much shaking and stamping in the porch passed in.

The change from the blinding storm to the quiet of the church, with the rich, deep lights, made an instant impression on both. But as they were given seats at once they had time for only hasty glances around. Fortunately, they were in a position to see almost the whole interior without turning. The smooth notes of the organ opening the service prevented any exchange of opinions, but each wondered how it would please the other.

Presently a gowned figure came before the congregation and the people rose for the responses. Then the service proceeded according to the order which they found in the pews, and the Dudleys followed it eagerly. The dignity of the service was impressive, but not cold. Both felt at home, and the deacon forgot to fear for the effect of the new pews and woodwork on his thrifty wife.

Neither said much on the way home. The storm and their umbrellas occupied their attention. But once in their room the deacon said, "Well, how did it strike you?"

"Of course I liked Dr. Clark. There was nothing but common sense and gospel in that sermon. Some way I expected something different there. And I heard some one behind say he planned a great many of the improvements. Why, it's much as ever our minister could see to putting up a porch. I can't say I like all that filigree woodwork."

"Maybe I'm wrong," said the deacon, "but I didn't grudge a cent of the money that went into those windows and all the rest of it. They say art is the handmaid of religion, don't they, and if I'm any judge they've put her to work on the right lines there."

"To tell the truth, Jacob, I'm kind of mixed up. If it hadn't been for that sermon I couldn't have felt right about it. It seemed as if it couldn't be a good orthodox Congregationalist church. I've got used to the gown and responses by this time. But he read in one place and talked in another and preached in another, just like the Episcopals. And then all those windows! I was afraid I shouldn't hear a word of the sermon for looking at them."

Here the deacon made a mental note that if she hadn't liked the windows she would not have felt that way, so he became bolder in expressing his own opinions.

"I can't help it, I like it. The directions for building the temple kept coming into my head. Besides, even if you had looked at the windows in sermon time I guess those 'saints, apostles, prophets, martyrs' wouldn't have hurt you much. It don't seem to be stained glass for stained glass's sake, but to help people worship God, and if that isn't part of the beauty of holiness what is it?"

Mrs. Dudley thoughtfully rubbed her spectacles. "I must say it did seem to all work in together harmonious. I'm sure I hope it's right to have things so beautiful even when it costs. I shouldn't like to judge them harshly. If they have the money and are glad to give it to make the Lord's house beautiful it's not for me to complain. And then that plate was full of bills for the City Missionary Society. So perhaps it's all right. And I did admire those little umbrella racks along the aisles."

"Dr. Clark paid a great compliment to the City Missionary Society, didn't he, to say that he knew of no better managed society in any city. It's a pity that good Mr. Wadley wasn't there to hear it."

"Is it letting up a little?" asked the deacon, as he took down The Congregationalist that had been opened over his head while he was taking a comfortable Sunday afternoon nap.

"Why, were you going out again?" asked his wife.

"I've had a notion I'd like to go to a little German church over on Shawmut Avenue. I came round by there the other day and made up my mind I'd go. You know I always felt as if I knew more about Germans after that summer Hans Schnell helped me with the haying."

"You don't mean that they have the sermon in German, do you?" cried Mrs. Dudley.

"That's what I want to find out," replied the deacon.

"For mercy's sake, what do you think you could do, Deacon Dudley, when you didn't know what was said or done?"

"I guess I could make out the drift of things. Anyway I could watch and see what the rest were doing. Don't you feel able to go?"

"No, sir, Jacob, I'm willing to go most anywhere with you if it's respectable and English is talked, but not on any crazy errands where you can't understand what's said."

So the deacon went alone. When he returned it was with the manner of a man who has followed his determination with no detriment to his own opinions, and so is blandly willing to concede something to his womankind. So without waiting to be questioned he volunteered at once: "It was German from beginning to end, Hannah, Bible, prayers, hymns, sermon and all. But it was mighty interesting."

Hannah could hardly forbear a sniff at this, for it seemed distinctly an affectation on the deacon's part.

"What, the sermon?" she inquired. "I should like to know, Jacob Dudley, how you knew which was Bible and which was sermon?"

"O, that was easy enough," said the deacon. "He gave out his chapter and verse, I suppose, and the name of the book wasn't so very different. I did get rather sleepy in the sermon, but I looked around and studied the hymn-book. They do about the opposite from us. They sit when they sing and stand during the prayer and Scripture reading. It's a Lutheran church, and I wouldn't be at all surprised if they did it at first just to be different from Catholics."

"What kind of a church was it inside?" asked Mrs. Dudley, somewhat mollified by the deacon's return to his usual manner.

"Well, it was plain, a good deal like a country church. The pulpit was very high and all draped in black broadcloth, with two high brass lamps or gas on each side and winding stairs on the sides. What seemed stranger than the pulpit was a crucifix behind it, framed, or carved on a square of wood, and on each side there was an oil painting in a gilt frame, Christ on the right and Luther on the left. I tell you, Hannah, it was interesting."

"What was the singing like?"

"That was the best part. What do you think they sang for one tune? Old Hundred, and a lot of it. It made me feel good. I sang right along with the rest of 'em."

"I shouldn't have thought you would, Jacob. What do you suppose they'd think of you?"

"Bless you, they were all singing so loud they didn't know anything about me. If the meter had been right I should have sung 'Let every kindred every tribe,' it was so appropriate."

After this Mrs. Dudley felt that nothing more could be said, so she took up her Life and Light, saying to herself, "Jacob always would have his notions, and I don't know but they're pretty good ones."

MISSISSIPPI STATE ASSOCIATION

The fourteenth annual meeting was held at Tougaloo March 18, 19. The membership is small, but the meetings were well attended by the students and instructors of the university, and the exercises were helpful and inspiring. Specially notable on the first evening was an address by Rev. C. L. Harris of Meridian on A Southerner's Observations and Reflections in New England. It set forth quite clearly the fact, recognized by almost all thoughtful observers, that the young Negro's best chance for success in life is in the South, and the prediction was made that within fifty years the status of the colored people in the South as respects equality of treatment in the cars and elsewhere will be the same as in the North.

The licensing of two young men who will graduate from the theological department of the university this year was an interesting feature of one afternoon's session. Several of the most useful of the A. M. A. ministers in the South have been Tougaloo students. The reports from the churches showed life in many forms. Especially notable was a report from a missionary field far off in the woods where there has been for several years no pastor, but where a number of Sunday schools have been kept up, one of them numbering 250. Quite unique was the statement that when the pastor of the Meridian Church was ill his pulpit was supplied by a Jewish rabbi, a man of broad sympathies and so well thought of in Meridian that one of the public schools has been named in his honor. The closing meeting on Friday night had three vigorous addresses on Qualifications for Service, by Rev. W. J. Larkin, The Black Belt as a Missionary Field, by Rev. C. L Harris, and The Work of Congregationalism in the South, by Rev. G. S. Pope. W.

Ministers' Meeting

The gathering last Monday was larger than usual and the exercises rather unique. Dr. Gilbert, who has them in charge, hit upon the novel plan of having the subject of missions discussed in its various departments by persons whose duties lie outside the field whose cultivation they commended. Thus Secretary Hitchcock of the American Board spoke in behalf of home missions, and Secretary Tompkins of foreign missions. Rev. Mr. Dickinson of The Standard gave an account of the recent discussion by the Chicago Baptists on Systematic Beneficence, and of the purpose for which these conferences in several of our larger places have been held. Dr. Roy represented benevolence in general, and Mr. S. M. Moore gave a brief account of his experiences in Turkey, where he went last summer to meet his daughter, Mrs. C. F. Gates of Harpoot, and where he had an opportunity to see for himself the havoc which the Turkish Government has wrought among its own subjects. At his request the meeting decided to ask President McKinley to appoint Hon. John W. Foster minister to Constantinople, and also to raise the office to the dignity of an ambassadorship. It was also decided to write Mr. Foster, urging him to accept the appointment if it be made. No man has done more for the Armenians in this country than Mr. Moore and, as has already been stated, he has started a colony for them in Georgia.

The Club

A proposal to limit the number of meetings each year to six, instead of eight, was promptly voted down, as was also the proposition to reduce the annual dues from ten dollars to seven and one-half. The club decided, in view of the hard times, to reduce the initiation fee from ten to five dollars. Ladies are to be invited whenever the executive committee chooses to do so. By an almost unanimous vote the legislature was requested to reject the Humphrey Bill now under discussion at Springfield. This bill, it is thought, would prevent the city from securing any proper compensation for its streets for fifty years to come, and would practically compel patrons of the street cars to pay a five-cent fare for that period. In addition it takes the control of the streets, so far as street car companies are concerned, out of the hands of the Common Council and puts it into the hands of commissioners to be appointed by the governor. It is not yet certain that the bill will be defeated, opposed as it is to the best interests not only of Chicago, but of the other cities of the commonwealth. The guest of the evening was Prof. R. T. Ely of the University of Wisconsin, who spoke on some neglected aspects of municipal reform. While admitting the necessity of a business method in city government, he thought that the aim ought to be to govern the city as a great household, in which all who reside within its limits have a common interest. American cities should study European methods in municipal matters. He advocated the German method, which requires its administrative officers to be experts in their departments, and which fills a vacancy in the mayorship with the best man who can be found in the empire, if he can be had. Professor Ely was suffering from the grip, but insisted upon filling his appointment for the evening.

North Side Fellowship Meeting

A fellowship meeting embracing the Congregational churches on the North Side of the city was held, March 25, in the beautiful new chapel of the Lincoln Park Church, Dr. David Beaton, pastor. The sessions were well attended, and the program was rich and profitable. Rev. C. H. Keays read a paper on Books That Have Helped Me; Rev. W. H. Manss discussed the subject of the Pastor and Bible Criticism; Rev. E. B. Dean The Relation of the Pastor to Benevolence. The papers read at the afternoon session were prepared by ladies, and were on such topics as Kindergarten Teaching in the Infant Department of Our Sunday Schools, How Far Are Parents Responsible for the Conversion of Their Children? What Is the Ladies' Society Doing and Not Doing for the Ladies of Our Congregations? The evening session was in the hands of laymen, who spoke of the Things a Pastor Ought Not To Do and of A Model Trustee. No one was more ready to admit the excellence and value of the sessions given up to the laity than the pastors. One of the features of the work during the present season on the North Side has been the close relation with each other into which our churches there have been brought.

An Annual Council

Our Baptist brethren are proposing a novel method of managing their church affairs. At a meeting called for the purpose, and consisting of the pastor and two delegates from every church in the city and vicinity, the plan of choosing a council to serve a year and to discharge the duties which belong to the ordinary recognizing and installing councils was discussed with a good deal of earnestness, and finally adopted by a vote of forty-five to thirty three. At the end of every year the council is to be made up of new members. If two-thirds of the churches belonging to the association favor this plan of procedure it will be tried. The council cannot act except on the invitation of the church which desires its services. There were a good many objections to the plan, chiefly on the ground that such a council is unnecessary, and that the present plan of calling a council when one is desired works well enough. To an outsider it looks a little as if one of the freest of all our church organizations were squinting toward ecclesiasticism.

University of Chicago

Baccalaureate services were held in Cobb Hall Sunday afternoon. After brief remarks by President Harper, the sermon was preached by Prof. W. D. Mackenzie. His discourse closed the series which has been given at the university Sunday afternoons and at Central Music Hall Sunday evenings on the general topic, Life After Death. Professor Mackenzie treated the question from the point of view of philosophy. At the spring convocation, which will occur April 1 in the Auditorium, Lady Aberdeen will speak on The University and Its Effect on the Home.

Opening of the John Crerar Library

This will occur April 1 and will continue three days. All the rooms on the sixth floor of the Marshall Field building will be open for inspection, and the librarian, C. W. Andrews, Esq., with his staff, will show the visitors the library. Thereafter the library will be accessible to visitors every day except Sunday and legal holidays, from 9 A. M. to 6 P. M. As is well known Mr. Crerar, who died Oct. 19, 1889, left a portion of his estate amounting to not less than $2,500,000 for a library to be located on the South Side. Efforts to break the will were unsuccessful, but it was not till Oct. 12, 1894, that the library was incorporated. It was duly organized July 12, 1895. Considering the wishes of Mr. Crerar and the fact that the City Library furnishes the popular literature demanded and that the Newberry Library is especially rich in history and Americana, it was decided to make this a free reference library of a scientific character. Its special field will be that of the natural, the physical and the social sciences with their application.

The three libraries will thus divide the world of books between them. Their relation to each other will be that of co-operation rather than competition. Perhaps at no distant day the three libraries may issue a common catalogue for the convenience of their patrons. There are now about 15,000 volumes on the shelves and 7,000 more in preparation. By the end of 1898 it is expected that the library will contain 40,000 volumes. There will be 1,200 periodicals in the reading-room. It is thought that the present accommodations will be ample for five, or even ten, years. In the meanwhile it is proposed to set aside every year a portion of the income for a permanent building. Already this building fund amounts to more than $100,000. While this policy will limit the amount devoted to the purchase of books, it is undoubtedly the wisest policy to pursue, inasmuch as it will secure, as the directors say, "an undiminished capital fund to provide, maintain and support a library for all time to come." Under the co-operative policy adopted by our libraries Chicago will soon be furnished with excellent facilities for research, as well as for the consultation of books which are purely ephemeral in their character.

Tribute to Rev. Dr. George H. Wells

Few men were more highly esteemed than the late Dr. Wells. Few were more completely consecrated to the ministry, or more anxious to make it an agency of the greatest possible service. The tribute to his worth, spontaneously given at the funeral services held in Dover, Ill., where he had been brought up, and where his aged father still lives, were tender and touching in the extreme. Plymouth Church, Minneapolis, Dr. Wells's last pastorate, sent its present pastor, Dr. D. N. Beach, and two of its honored laymen to the funeral. Dr. Beach took part in the services, bearing appropriate and grateful testimony to the blessings which his ministry had brought to Minneapolis and to the honor in which his name is there held. Dr. Wells was often in Chicago and was always gladly heard in our pulpits.

Special Christian Work

There are few men anywhere who have done more for the Master, or have had greater joy in the service they have tried to render him, than Mr. K. A. Burnell of Aurora, Ill. Although speaking two or three times every Sunday, either at missions or in some of our churches, he has yet given, year after year, five days of each week to house to house visitation, both in the country and in the city. Since Jan. 1, 1897, he has made and written up 3,300 visits made among the poor of Chicago. His plan is to converse on religious matters with those visited, and to learn from them their spiritual condition and in what way they can be encouraged or stimulated in a Christian life. Some of the results of these visits are instructive as well as painfully suggestive. Thus inquiry has shown that not more than one out of every hundred of our Sunday school teachers visits regularly their pupils, and that out of every hundred families not more than from five to seven have a family altar. For more than forty years now Mr. Burnell has followed the Harlan Page method of doing Christian work—"By divine grace I will act as though I were the only one to act, waiting no longer for others." Copying the example of Harlan Page, Mr. Burnell has gone "from house to house among the poor and told the one next to him about the Saviour he has found." For a score of years Mr. Burnell has had delight in the acquaintance and fraternal sympathy of Mr. George M. Cook of the South Church, who has lost no opportunities to bear testimony to his love for Christ and to labor among the poor and outcast.

IN TRANSITU

BY MARY GOODALE SLOCUM

I do not ask for sudden light
To pierce the way beyond my sight,
That time when all alone I go
Upon the journey that I know
Leads through deep floods, where men have lost
Ofttimes all courage ere they crossed;
Nor do I ask the power to hear
Celestial voices, glad and clear,
Bidding me welcome through the night,
Assuring me that, glad and bright,
The heavenly city lies close by
My earth-tired feet, and that my eye
Shall swiftly see, my ear shall hear,
The wonders of the land so near;
These seem so slight a boon to heed
Beside the one for which I plead,
That greater good my soul doth crave
That through it all I may be brave!

A little incident occurred in a certain grammar school not long ago which illustrates the danger of weakening character by withholding tests of virtue. It was the old story of pupils violating the rule against whispering and then rendering a false report. In discussing the matter with the principal of the school, he gravely maintained that it were better to omit taking the report than to place before the pupils the temptation to lie about their conduct. But he was opposed by the teacher in whose room the misdemeanor occurred, on the ground that boys and girls must face evil when they go out into the world and where shall they learn power of resistance if not in the schoolroom? Are not both parents and teachers too prone to be lax in discipline nowadays? Is it any real kindness to shield our young people from the shafts of temptation, thus leaving them weak and defenseless when parental and other safeguards are removed? How else do we become strong, physically and morally, than by exercise?

TWO SERVICES

BY FRANCES C. SPARHAWK

"You promised it!" and Mrs. Austin's eyes flashed. The smoldering discontent of the past month had kindled into wrath.

"I know it, Mary. But"—

"But you can't afford it, of course," sarcastically. "I should say, now, that you couldn't afford to break your word, and about such a little thing, too!"

"Mary, do you mean to make me sorry for what I have done?" The question was intensely earnest.

The angry eyes wavered and fell.

"I could have given it to you but for this thing," pursued the speaker. "You don't wish it different, Mary, do you?" A silence. "Do you?" he repeated, with passionate eagerness.

"Of course not. You know that well enough. But"—

"It's the choice, my dear. I told you it would make me poorer for the time."

Again a silence, in which the man's gaze was bent fixedly upon the face of his hearer. Then she said, "Forgive me, Henry. You are right. I must not mind. Of course, I'll try not to."

"I'm sorry, wifie." And he kissed her good-by gravely as he went to his business.

She stood thoughtful. Her husband had told her shortly before that a terrible temptation had come to him to make a pile of money lawfully, by man's law, but in a way that would leave many other people helplessly poorer, and not a few of these would be women. He had resisted. How proud of him she had been, how ready to fall in with his statement that for a time they would have less for this opportunity lost—ready until it came to her giving up the new sealskin he had promised her this winter, and then she had sulked for weeks and finally broken out into reproaches.

A choice between righteousness and luxury had been offered him. He had been true to his best self, as he always was. To her, also, through his, the same choice had been given—ah! she saw it now—and for all these weeks she had in her heart been choosing, which? She had not understood it in this way before. She put up a fervent prayer for forgiveness.

She rose from her petition comforted, feeling that she had been forgiven. Hers had been a wrong craving, since its gratification would be through evil, but in itself it was so natural at the worst, so womanish! And in her own heart, softening her self-reproaches, she felt a touch of the tenderness with which she was sure her Heavenly Father regarded her in her contrition. What a blessed service she had been in all these twenty-one years since she had made profession of her faith! What loving-kindness had guided her steps and led her tenderly from her mistakes into better ways! How her husband's love and her children had been given to her, and her highest duties of love and care for them made her greatest pleasures! Yes, the yoke of the divine Master was easy, and for all erring and repentant was the tender word of forgiveness and blessing. How light, indeed, and how full of love was the burden of the servitude that he laid upon us, his brothers and sisters, as we were of our fellow-mortals! As she sat down to her sewing the happy consciousness lingered with her for a time, and then her thoughts drifted back into their usual channels. It was over two hours before she went down stairs.

"Minna! Again! How can you! You can't count on your fingers the times I've told you never to sweep the parlor until you had carefully covered the nice furniture that is too heavy to lift out. And now look at that velvet sofa, just white with dust. It's just too much!"

As she paused, breathless with anger, the low voice of the servant girl answered, in her stammering English, "I very sorry, missis."

"'Sorry!'" echoed the other, contemptuously. "That's what you say every time you do anything wrong. That doesn't make up. I took the trouble to cover the furniture myself to show you how, because I thought you might not understand telling. I might have saved myself the pains!"

"Yes, missis," returned the girl, her look of trouble deepening as she failed to catch the meaning of the sarcastic words. "I know you show me. But it rain that day; you say it rain when you working, an' so I understand you mean do it w'en it rain."

The incredulity in Mrs. Austin's sharp laugh she did comprehend, and the gathered tears fell to make room for others that quivered in the blue eyes and then followed down the flushed cheeks.

"It's very trying," the mistress went on, "to have a girl that doesn't see things in the right way at once. And don't cry, Minna, it's babyish. Nobody gives more to girls than I do, and nobody exacts less, only that you shall do in the right way what you have to do. You're very forgetful, Minna."

"I sorry. I try hard, I learn pretty soon," responded the girl.

"O, your words and promises don't count for anything. I shall not excuse you until I see that you do better. That's what I require. Now, I'm going to give you just one more trial, and if you keep making mistakes I shall have to let you go. Do you understand?"

The girl bowed her head and turned away her tear-stained face from the eyes that were watching it with sarcastic sternness.

The mistress sat in her room angrily stabbing her work with her rapid needle. She really would not stand Minna, the girl was inexcusable. And to hear her say always she was sorry when she ought not to have done the thing at all was simply aggravating. "If I were a servant, paid for my time, I would not be so unfaithful," she said to herself. And there came to her a soothing consciousness of the thoroughness of her own performances—sewing that never ripped, knitting that never slipped stitches, dusting that never scalloped, bread never slackly baked or overdone; she did nothing by halves, and she rejoiced in the knowledge. Yes, had it been her lot to be a servant she would have been far different from Minna. She could not stand the girl.

Mrs. Austin was proud of the way in which she treated her servants. They had a comfortable room, were never overworked, received good wages regularly paid and had more time for going out than they were really entitled to. And for all these things all that she required was perfect service, a most reasonable requirement, and one that she intended to have met. She had a right to it, she paid for it.

Minna's heart was heavy. She seemed farther than ever away from the dear land of her birth, and the tears would run down fast at the recollection that she was thousands of miles from anybody who cared at all for her. Then she thought of those she had left that she might earn and help them in their need; she remembered the last blessing of her kind pastor, as with his hand on the head of the young girl he had known from her babyhood he called her one of the Lord's little ones. The bitterness went out of her heart, though the loneliness seemed deeper for the very memories that had filled it. It was true that she did forget, and truer that she did not always understand her orders, but it was truest that she had already made much gain in both ways. She would try harder and keep her place, and work for the dear home.

One necessity in Mrs. Austin's perfect service was that her servants should know their places. That afternoon Miss Kate Austin came into the kitchen with an order from her mother for Minna. As at her entrance the girl looked up from her work, something in the age and bearing of the other reminded her suddenly of her own fair younger sister in Sweden. The light came into her own face and she smiled at the comer. No thought of equality was in her heart, except that of youth and human kindness.

The fair face of Kate Austin was as irresponsive as a wooden block; she gave her order icily, and with lofty bearing passed out, to tell her mother that that girl had presumed to grin at her. As she went, the atmosphere of character, which every human being bears about, floated out after her and filled the kitchen with a chill, for the sunshine of family brightness and happiness never touched this north side of life.

The same evening Mrs. Austin was listening delightedly to the conversation of her husband and a brilliant friend of his as the two were discussing the evidences of the coming out of the Jews from their ages of exclusiveness, and recounting the proofs in their early laws that they had but received greater knowledge in order that they might freely give, that they were in God's service to show the world what such service should be—the forerunner of Christianity, the fullness.

"There is that forceful command," continued the guest, "as to kindness toward the stranger within their gates, the captives, the slaves, all who might stand in relations of humility toward them. Why, it's the very essence of Christian conduct today."

"How beautiful!" was the inward comment of Mrs. Austin, the Christian philanthropist.

With the thought something made her look up. There in the doorway stood a girl of twenty, her face flushed with shyness, on her tongue the hesitation of one who has to speak in a strange language, in her heart, plainly shown by her bearing, the fear of rebuff and censure for appearing at all, and yet standing her ground because duty required that she should at once tell her mistress of something that needed her attention.

Did the search-light of the Spirit throw a new radiance upon this figure, come at this opportune moment? For as the mistress, with the word of the old command ringing in her ears, looked with startled eyes at Minna, suddenly she saw in her the little stranger within her own gates.

THE INFANT CLASS

BY MRS. ELIZABETH MCL. ROWLAND

Nearly everything that is written about primary Sunday school classes presupposes a large city school, a separate room and superintendent, graded classes with teachers, public school methods and discipline. But hundreds of teachers in small churches and scattered neighborhoods face a totally different situation, as my nine years' experience with a class averaging above twenty has proved to me. Mine is literally an infant class. I take them early, often at three or less, and send them out at seven, or six even if they can read a little, because I find that I succeed better so than if I keep them longer and have classes and teachers under me. My children are thus so nearly of one grade that if I reach one mind I reach nearly all.

I have never visited a primary class with children of nine and ten in it where the attention of all was held. Usually the little ones are neglected while the older ones get the teaching and answer the questions. I must own, however, that the singing of a strictly infant class will be confined to a few tunes poorly sung, and its teachers must learn to sing on in spite of discords and mistakes. I have an assistant, who marks for the secretary, distributes papers and receives the money. She also takes away fans and parasols, finds pennies in deep pockets and intricate purses, confiscates marbles, holds the irrepressible baby awhile, separates pugilists and wipes the tears, while I teach the lesson.

I long ago decided that I could not tell all the Bible stories, teach its history and geography, the Apostles' Creed and the higher criticism, to children between the ages of three and seven during half an hour on pleasant Sundays. So I said, "I will plant a seed, I will cultivate a habit." I took for my motto, The seed is the Word, therefore my children shall learn Bible verses, and they shall also be trained to give.

After staying with the main school through the devotional exercises we go into the parlors for forty minutes, call the roll, giving a second credit to those who can say present, church, which averages one-half of the number in the class, and then we take the collection before the money gets lost. Two children pass the hats, while we all repeat (not sing) the verses beginning, "Hear the pennies dropping." We add up the sums in the hats, change the pennies into dimes and let the children, in turn, push the dimes into a gem bank for some special object, such as a window in a home missionary church—all trivial exercises, but they keep the object of the gift in view, and no child makes the mistake of thinking the teacher wants his money for peanuts. I hear from parents that their children insist on a penny for Sunday school just as they do for the monkey with the hand-organ. My aim is to cultivate the habit—the principle is a later growth. Next comes our prayer, beginning,

I thank thee, God, for giving me
Another happy night.

Then the children tell me what they believe. One raises her hand and says she believes "in God above," and another says "in Jesus' love." By this time the shyness wears off and two or three more are ready to respond. By that time we are ready to repeat the child's creed in unison. We use no question-book or quarterly, but give each child at the close of school a colored picture-paper, which has in it, not only the lesson of the day for home review, but the Golden Text for next Sunday. It is on this verse that I lay the most stress. Every child who can repeat it is praised heartily, and if she has not learned it at home she must repeat it after me, every child, every Sunday, till the dullards and laggards can repeat them in unison as we review the texts for the quarter every Sunday. We also have a handful of selected verses that we tell off on our fingers, and in this way I hope that even the child who leaves Sunday school early will take with him enough of God's Word to find his Saviour and direct his life.

My great help is the picture roll, and if I could not have that I would string the colored picture lesson-cards and use them like a roll. If the class is small and must be in the room with the school, these might serve about as well. I explain the Golden Text, show the new picture and tell its story, and then hear the lesson, review and advance, on the roll, asking question after question, going over it again and again, calling up Johnny to find the cloud that hid our Lord as he vanished and lifting Jenny to put her finger on the two angels that said he would come back again. I turn the roll, and the very little boys can find the lame man with bare legs and crutches. This is a good place to stop and repeat our verse beginning, "These are the twelve apostles' names," and decide which of the two apostles these are who have something better than gold or silver dollars for the poor fellow. We find everything in the picture. We count the people, name the children and guess how much Ananias had in his bag. Order suffers, for half the children are on their feet at once, and every one wants to point out something he sees on the roll—but they go home and talk about the lesson.

It requires some hardihood to confess that I neither use nor want to use a blackboard. My children cannot read from either book or blackboard. The ingenious anagrams and rebuses recommended in many "helps," the chalk lessons—yellow marks for the disciples and a white one for Christ, a green square for a synagogue and a brown dot for a blind man, a key to remember that love unlocks the door of the heart, and a candle to show what the Bible does for our feet—all these seem to me to make darkness deeper and to add perplexity to simple ignorance. Nor do I believe that little children get any real instruction out of such exercises. Older scholars may, perhaps, grown people, visitors, especially those who neither teach nor study, and those who know much less of the Bible than they are willing to acknowledge. All these watch with delight the handling of colored crayons on a blackboard, and with open-eyed wonder and bated breath follow the teacher as she pins up great white hearts stamped with red letters; and when the red letters finally spell out a text, they smile and sigh, just as they would do if a juggler had pulled a rabbit out of a borrowed hat. But to the little child, who has doubtless been amused by it all as a "show," between the colored chalks and the paper hearts, the flags and the keys, the impression is confused, the lesson is misunderstood and nothing is left for him to carry away.

After all our efforts we often fail utterly. I once thought I was making it very plain when I told of Joseph sold as a slave, but I found no child had any idea connected with the word slave. In a lesson on the Lord's Supper, I might as well have talked Choctaw, for the eleven out of the sixteen present that rainy Sunday had never seen the communion table, and every one of the eleven, as it happened, the child of a church member! Years ago I carefully explained that when Zacharias prayed he lighted some sweet smelling powder called incense, and prayed to God as the smoke rose. The next week, when I asked on the roll, "What is this burning on the altar?" one child answered, "Insects!" But another jumped to her feet and corrected him with, "No, t'ain't insects, its insect powder!"

How little of the Bible is taught to children even in Christian homes! What can a teacher do in half an hour when she must do all? Very little at the best, and that is the reason why I lay so much stress on committing the verses to memory. It isn't much that the most successful teacher can do for such little ones, but what is learned before seven has a way of sticking in the memory to the end of life. It is rather an old-fashioned way; little is said about it nowadays, but it is the only method with a promise of God behind it. So I hold on to the promise and plant my seed.

Mothers in Council

COURTESY TO CHILDREN

Rob and Mab were playing "choo-choo." A long line of chairs stretched across the room, and Rob was stationed in the mail car, energetically throwing out and snatching in the mail-bags. Mab, as passenger, sat with serene composure in a rear sleeper. Papa, coming into the room with the morning paper in his hand, innocently seated himself in one of the chairs.

"O, papa, that's the coal car! You're sitting right in the coal! You'll get all dirty!" exclaimed Rob in distress.

Mr. B—— was intent on the paper, and paid no attention.

His father did not move, but said, decidedly: "No, no, Rob. You can't have all the chairs in the room to play with. Papa wants to sit here and read his paper." Whereupon this usually polite gentleman planted his feet in the cab of the engine and became immersed in politics.

No appeal was possible, and a very uncomfortable half-hour followed. The children's play was spoiled, the spell broken. The "choo-choo" of Rob's imagination was a wreck, and he had been thrown rudely back into a world where the combined duties of engineer, conductor, brakeman and mailman were no longer required of him. His restless activity, goaded into exercise by a latent sense of injustice, found vent in mischief. He snatched Mab's doll, demolished her block house, teased the baby and fretted incessantly. Every diversion failed. Finally he was banished to the nursery by an indignant father. Mab followed, and a troubled silence reigned. At length Mr. B—— dropped the now uninteresting paper, saying: "Of course that was a piece of mistaken management. I ought to have taken a passenger's ticket on the train, and so secured the privilege of reading my paper in peace."

"Or the children would have been delighted if you had expressed consternation over the supposed damage to your coat," suggested his wife.

"To be sure. Instead I was distinctly rude to the poor babies, and spoiled their happy play."

"You are usually considerate," said his wife, apologetically, "but it is hard to be consistent in these things. I shall be tripping next."

And she did. It happened in this way. Rob was busy with pencil and paper. When he needed a rubber he went to his mother and asked for one, but she was busy and apparently did not even hear the repeated request. At length Rob began to fret. Her attention thus secured, Mrs. B—— confiscated pencil and paper as a punishment for peevishness, saying: "If Rob had asked pleasantly mamma would have been glad to give him the rubber."

Even as she spoke, however, by a curious flash of memory and conscience, she recalled the first request and its subsequent repetition. Gathering the surprised child into her arms, she exclaimed: "Excuse mamma, Rob! I remember now that you did ask pleasantly at first, and mamma was so busy that she did not really hear."

Upon another occasion Mrs. B—— had the pleasure of proving the value of tact and consideration. The children were again steaming across country behind an imaginary locomotive, when she disturbed them by unexpected and highly inappropriate kisses.

"Why, mamma, we're playing choo-choo, and going all the way to New York!" exclaimed Rob.

Realizing her mistake, the mother asked instantly, "But won't you kiss mamma good-by?"

This was satisfactory, and the children lifted eager faces in farewell. A few moments later, however, mamma again forgot the game and sat down upon the couch which served as a train. The immediate outcry was promptly heeded, but when the train "slowed up," in approaching the next station, she boarded it with all due formalities, calling forth shouts of appreciation from the little people. Then they had a happy ride through fields and woods, over bridges and through towns, till Rob's quick eyes saw in the glow and blaze of the open wood fire the "lights of the great city in the distance." (A delightful play of the imagination!)

Children appreciate courtesy shown them by grown people, and they also notice a failure in politeness on the part of those with whom they come in contact. One afternoon Rob fairly burst into tears because a gentleman who was calling at the house failed in a simple act of courtesy.

"He didn't say good-by to Rob," lamented the child. The same afternoon we went to call upon a friend, and when we took leave our host followed us to the door and called, "Good-by, Rob!" After we had left the house the little fellow's face was radiant.

"He did say good-by to Rob!" he soliloquized gleefully, and with an emphasis that indicated plainly his remembrance of the former omission. Upon another occasion the children went to the post office and a working man opened the heavy door for them.

"That is a nice man," said Rob, "he opened the door for Mab and Rob."

In my study of children I am constantly discovering new directions in which this simple oil of courtesy may be useful. When making a demand upon the services of a child, for instance, one soon learns to avoid a sudden interruption of some absorbing occupation. A slight warning is easily given as, "Rob, when your horse is put up in the barn will you hand mamma that book from the table?" or, "Will Mab call nurse for mamma when dollie is put to bed?"

Children are so imitative that the surest way of teaching them good manners lies in the constant practice of politeness in dealing with them, and it may also be said, incidentally, that they are especially quick in reproducing the bearing of their elders towards servants and dependents. A child's intuition is sure, however, and his imitation always goes deeper than the external act, reaching to the inner thought and intention. He may fail in reproducing the graceful manner or courteous speech if it is not sincere, but will never fail to divine and grow up into the real spirit of those about him.

DOROTHEA BIRD.

WILD OATS

Who gives the boy the seed for his sowing? Often the father in recalling stories of his young days to college friends, while the boy sits open-mouthed and open-eared beside him. No wonder that like Hilary, the hero of a late much criticised story, the boy decides that when he is a man he will have like stories to tell. Even younger than his father he begins to sow his wild oats, sowing them deeper, thicker and more broadcast, while his father mourns over the degeneracy of his son, crediting it to mistaken methods of education, to anything and everything except his own words.

A father told the story of a falsehood which he once told his mother. His little girl listened with wonder, and the mother saw that the large gray eyes grew larger as the child listened to her father's story. A few days afterward the before truthful, though somewhat fanciful, child told an absolute falsehood, and when in great grief her mother asked, "Charlotte, why did you tell mamma an untruth?" the child lifted her eyes clear and bright, with no look of shame or regret, saying, "When papa was a little boy he told a wrong story to his mamma." The child's mamma explained that papa was less than two years old and afterwards became a truthful boy, and continued, "Papa would be greatly grieved to know that his six-year-old daughter, who knew better, had told an untruth." The child accepted the explanation and was sorry for her fault. Yet the mother is sometimes in doubt whether that little seed was wholly uprooted, or still has an undergrowth of rootlets that may push their way into the child's after life. This was the mistake of an unusually careful father. What of those who take little or no thought of the matter and manner of their conversation in presence of their children?

For instance, a boy of fourteen joins a group of men who are telling stories which are a disgrace to manhood, or, if not absolutely bad, are suggestive of impurity. The oath was used in the original story to emphasize a point. Who of the group of men refrains from the use of the latter, or, as they say, "spoils a good story," because of the presence of the boy? If they stop to think two-thirds of the men would say, He is a boy, and he must hear such things sometime. I tell you nay. God pity the boys of such fathers. They tie stones about the neck of their own sons to sink them into fathomless depths of misery and shame. God is most merciful, and if, in the extremity of sin and suffering, they cry unto him he will save them from the penalty of their own and their father's sin, yet what is such a wreck of a life worth? Strange as it may seem, those same fathers are loving, kind and devoted to their children. Who shall open their blind eyes, that they may see before their children eat the bitter fruit which they raise to their lips? Would that my feeble words might reach some such and cause them to speak sweet, pure words in the presence of their sons, if not in all places and on all occasions.

But there is a difference in the treatment of the girls and boys. Alas! that it cannot be said, even of all women, that they touch not, taste not, handle not, in thought, word or deed, anything that is other than sweet and pure. Scandal tells its story by the mouth of women, but the women are few who will not pause and, with a blush, change such conversation upon the entrance of a young girl, even if that young girl is neither kith nor kin to them, and much more when she is their own daughter.

While there yet might be some subjects which it would be unwise or premature to discuss in the presence of young people, would that it were true that neither men, in their conversation with each other, or women in theirs with their own sex, ever said anything which would be harmful to either boys or girls. Yet, while humanity is as it is, I plead that the boy equally with the girl be kept from the blight too often cast upon his life by the stories told in his hearing by his elders.

ALICE HAMILTON RICH.

A little girl of tender years, who had been attending one of the public kindergartens, fell from a ladder. Her mother caught her up from the ground in terror, exclaiming, "O, darling, how did you fall?"

"Vertically," replied the child, without a second's hesitation.—Christian Register.

He who helps a child helps humanity with a distinctness, with an immediateness, which no other help given to human creatures in any other stage of their human life can possibly give again.—Phillips Brooks.

Closet and Altar

Your life needs days of retirement, when it shuts the gates upon the noisy whirl of action and is alone with God.

So long as we see men give themselves to one another and the power of one man passes into another man's life, so long it cannot be unintelligible or incredible that Christ gives himself to us. If it be so, that constantly men and women can give what is best in themselves to other men and women only with suffering, then it surely is not strange to find that Christ could not give himself to man without a pain that is the central tragedy of human history. He could not give himself to us without giving himself for us. The fountain out of which we were to drink until it became in us a well of water springing up to everlasting life could only spring from the foot of the cross whereon he died.—Phillips Brooks.

The way is long and dreary,
  The path is bleak and bare;
Our feet are worn and weary,
  But we will not despair.
More heavy was thy burden,
  More desolate thy way;
O Lamb of God, who takest
  The sin of the world away,
    Have mercy on us.

Our hearts are faint with sorrow,
  Heavy and hard to bear,
For we dread the bitter morrow,
  But we will not despair.
Thou knowest all our anguish,
  And thou wilt bid it cease;
O Lamb of God, who takest
  The sin of the world away,
    Give us thy peace!
        —Adelaide A. Proctor.

To await the growing of a soul is an almost divine act of faith. How pardonable, surely, the impatience of deformity with itself, of a consciously despicable character, standing before Christ, wondering, yearning, hungering to be like that. Yet must one trust the process fearlessly and without misgiving. "The Lord the Spirit" will do his part. . . . The creation of a new heart, the renewing of a right spirit, is an omnipotent work of God. No man, nevertheless, who feels the worth and solemnity of what is at stake will be careless as to his progress. To become like Christ is the only thing in the world worth caring for. Those only who make this quest the supreme desire of their lives can even begin to hope to reach it.—Henry Drummond.

We beseech thee, Almighty God! Healer and Comforter of man's sorrows, that not only those things which we have suffered in the body and the outward losses and pains of life may bless us; but also may the evil that we have done become to us the solemn gate through which, in penitence and sorrow having gone forth, in joy and rejoicing we may return. We beseech thee to make us wise that no dead past may have power to detain us long; give us not sackcloth and ashes but help us to gain the hight from which we never should have fallen; and in newness of heart and freshness of courage to do the things that we have hitherto left undone. Hear us of thy mercy. Make thy face clear to us. Lead us in patience, correction and loving-kindness through life and death into the eternal peace, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

A TRUE HOME

What is a home? A guarded space
  Wherein a few, unfairly blest,
Shall sit together, face to face,
  And bask, and purr, and be at rest?

Where cushioned walls rise up between
  Its inmates and the common air,
The common pain, and pad and screen
  From blows of fate or winds of care?

Where art may blossom strong and free,
  And pleasure furl her silken wing,
And every moment laden be,
  A precious and peculiar thing?

And past and future, softly veiled
  In hiding mists, shall float and lie
Forgotten half, and unassailed
  By either hope or memory,

While the luxurious present weaves
  Her perfumed spells untried, untrue,
'Broiders her garments, heaps her sheaves,
  All for the pleasure of a few?

Can it be this—the longed-for thing
  Which wanderers on the restless foam,
Unsheltered beggars, birds on wing,
  Aspire to, dream of, christen "home"?

No. Art may bloom, and peace and bliss;
  Grief may refrain and death forget;
But if there be no more than this
  The soul of home is wanting yet.

Dim image from far glory caught,
  Fair type of fairer things to be,
The true home rises in our thought
  As beacon for all men to see.

Its lamps burn freely in the night;
  Its fire-glows, unchidden, shed
Their cheering and abounding light
  On homeless folk uncomforted.

Each sweet and secret thing within
  Gives out a fragrance on the air—
A thankful breath sent forth to win
  A little smile from others' care.

The few, they bask in closer heat;
  The many catch the further ray;
Life higher seems, the world more sweet,
  And hope and heaven less far away.

So the old miracle anew
  Is wrought on earth and provèd good,
And crumbs apportioned for a few,
  God-blessed, suffice a multitude.
        —Susan Coolidge.

A LENTEN MEDITATION

As we draw near to the time when a large portion of the Christian Church specially commemorates the earthly sufferings of our Lord, these words from Phillips Brooks are full of comfort and suggestiveness:

It is not every sort of suffering that trains the souls of men. Simple suffering, taken by itself, has never any such educating power; it gets it only by the strength of some end or purpose that is discovered in it. The man who has suffered much, and yet who knows nothing of suffering but its pain, is hard and not soft; is selfish, querulous, ungrateful. The blows have beaten his outer nature into a crust to keep the inner life more than ever a prisoner, instead of breaking the outer life to let the inner life forth.

What then, must we put into suffering to make it a true means of education? Two things: First, hearty and cordial submission to another's will. Look at the child who patiently submits because his father says not, "You must," but "It is well you should." Look at the men and women everywhere who have no question after they have found out what God's will is, who simply go and do it, in whatever pain, because they know it must be right and best that his will should be done. In all such cases, where suffering comes out of willing submission to a superior and trusted will, it brings the sufferer into sympathy with the purpose of that will, it demands spiritual enterprise and faith, and so it calls out the better life and educates the soul.

There is another thing which you must add to suffering to make it a means of perfection. It must be the suffering not merely of faith, but of love. No man grows the best by what he suffers only for himself. There is not half as much spiritual culture in the pain of fever that tosses on the sick bed, submissive as it may be to God, as in the pain of sleeplessness and anxiety that watches by its side and not merely submits to God, but suffers for love of a fellow man. All the highest and most educating suffering of the world has been vicarious. It has been the suffering which the sufferer was in no way bound to bear, save as Jesus was bound to die for our sins. . . .

It is idle to talk of suffering as if it were the privilege of a few select lives only. Suffering and its culture, like joy and its culture, are within the lot of every man. He lives unworthily whose nature never clashes against the lower natures, and suffers pain. But mere pain is not education, does not bring growth. It is the suffering of willing submission to God and of self-sacrificing love for fellowmen that softens and spiritualizes and blesses us.

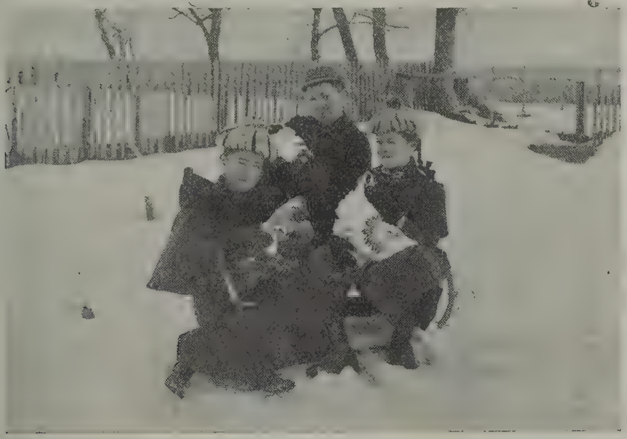
The Conversation Corner

PLEASE, Mr. Foreman, preface this piece with the prettiest P in all your fonts, to stand for Pets, for I pro pose to print a pile of letters in which the children tell us about their favorite animals. It is natural and right and proper for children to have animals for pets—although I have sometimes wondered why grown-up people with money and leisure should spend so much of both in unnecessary attention to a poodle dog, when so many poor little children are famishing and perishing, morally if not otherwise, for want of love and care. One day this week I saw Washington Street in Boston crowded full of people waiting for hours to get the slightest news about the disgusting fight, three thousand miles away, between two men who were trying to beat and bruise and maul each other as badly as they could, while thousands of others all over the land watched the papers to see which should come nearest to killing the other in the ferocious struggle. Infinitely better than this degrading interest in bloodthirsty human brutes is the kindly petting of innocent animals; so let us have the children's letters, although they take up the whole Corner—or two Corners!



A GROUP OF PETS

"I AM MONARCH OF ALL I SURVEY"

KINGSTON, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am ten years old today. My sister and I have some pets. They are rats, and my sister has a canary bird and a tame rooster. I have a tame hen. Then we have bantams and they are tame too. The rooster has had his picture taken. Would you like one? AMELIA C.

As the rooster had been at the trouble to sit (?) for his picture, I sent for it and got another also, with this explanation:

Dear Mr. Martin: My sister wants me to write this time. The girl holding the whitest hen is Amelia. The boy is our cousin visiting us from Nova Scotia—his name is Edgar. His rabbit's name is Speckle. The white hen's name is Whitie and the rooster's name is Jim Crow. He is mine and I tamed him. We have nine bantams and a lot of other hens. I have some Japanese rats. They are very cunning. FAITH C.

Later: The boy sold his pair of rabbits before he went home. We have given away the rats. The white hen is sick and papa has got to kill her. Jim Crow is alive and well.

I suppose the sledding is gone now as well as the smiling boy and the rabbit and the rats and the white hen. To make up for it, here are hens and snow in Alabama:

SHELBY, ALA.

Dear Mr. Martin: Two or three weeks ago the ground was white with sleet. Our hens came out from under the house and ate it as though it were something good. My brother hunts. We have birds almost every day. He says that a mocking bird will get among a flock of robins and when you start to shoot, it hollers and the robins fly. The little Vermont girl who sent you a picture of her brother on his bicycle is my cousin. LENA C.

Isn't it strange how Cornerers are cousins to each other all the way from Nova Scotia to Alabama? Perhaps Lena lived in Vermont herself once! Now that we are down in Dixie-land we will read letters from two girls in Virginia:

Dear Mr. Martin: My best friend and I are going to write to you. In our family there are six girls and I am the next youngest. Malinda is the baby and is three years old. We call her Linnet. For pets we have a canary named Cherry and a dog named Floss. MILDRED M.

I vote for Linnet as the most popular pet in that family!

My Dear Mr. Martin: I am thirteen years old. Am I too old to write to the Corner? [O no, I got a letter yesterday from a lady ninety years old!] I read the letters every week and like them so much. I am very fond of pets. I have two tame rabbits without names, a Maltese kitten named Polly, four gold-fish, a little puppy, Prince, and a big dog, Colonel, a little colt of my own named Princess, a calf named Gay and one named Tim for the children in Timothy's Quest that I read a little while ago. With best wishes for you and D. F., HELEN F.

I sent these girls certificates, but they came back to me through the post office. I was not sure of their address.

ELK RIVER, MINN.

Dear Mr. Martin: I like the Corner very much. I would like to join it and be a member. Mamma reads the Corners to me. I am six years old. We lived on our farm last summer, and kept ever so many sheep and lambs and hens and chickens and some cows and horses. We had one cow named Primrose and another named Cherry. One bossy was named Star and one Cherry Blossom. I thank you for putting so many nice things in the Corner. MARGARET H.

No, it is I who ought to thank you and all the other children for sending me so many nice things to put in—although I am not able to print half of what I get.

LUTESVILLE, MO.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am five years old and I go to Sunday school every Sunday and carry two nickels. Auntie puts some wheat in a pan up in a tree by our bay window and the bluebirds and the redbirds and red-headed woodpeckers come here every day for their dinner. God has just sent me a cousin—a sweet little baby boy. [I will predict that the warbling of this little "cousin" will soon be sweeter than the singing of the bluebirds!] Please give half of the money I send to Pomiuk, and half to the Armenian orphans. GEORGE W.

MACHIAS, ME.

Dear Mr. Martin: I would like to become a Cornerer. We have a pony. She is a bronco, and her name is Nettie. She is as kind as a kitten and we are all very fond of her. She does not like to be hitched very well. A few Sundays ago papa went to M—— to preach and he hitched the pony to the fence. Pretty soon there was a commotion outside, and when he went out to see what it was about there was the pony with a section of the fence pulled off. But she did not try to run away. Papa said, "A little more and that church would have been like a good man's conscience." Papa says it is a conundrum; can you guess it? We can't. KENNEDY C.

No, I have not been able to, all these three or four months the letter has been waiting, but just now it suddenly flashed upon me—of course, "a good man's conscience" is without offence!

REDLANDS, CAL.

Dear Mr. Martin: We have a big cat named Jimmy and a little one named Fuz. We have three horses; one of them is in pasture. The other day [in October!] we had a nice rain. The oranges are just turning yellow in this country but we can see the snow on the tops of the mountains. Could you tell me how Pomiuk is? [See March 18.] EDWIN L.

The next little boy's letter seems to be addressed to all of us as his audience:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

My Dear Friends: I will now tell you about my pets. I was walking along one day and I chanced to pass by a barn on my way to school in Chicago, and I saw a lot of little puppies. I went home and asked my papa to go and see them and he bought two of them. One was brown and the other black. The brown one we named "Brownie" and the black one "Nig." They grew to be big dogs, and very gentle, too. They kept burglars from the house. After a while I sold Brownie, and Nig was taken sick. The doctor came and said some one had given him poison, and in a few hours he died. Now, don't you think it was cruel to kill our dear dog? RICK V.

Yes, Rick, I do. And here is a strange story about the killing of another pet:

Dear Mr. Martin: I was very much interested in a story of a raven in the Corner Scrap-book of March 26, 1896. [This does not prove the length of Harold's memory, but the length of the time his letter has lain in my drawer!] I have just heard of something like it. A little way off there lives a lady who had a crow. This crow could say a few words. After a while a man shot the crow because the lady taught it to say his name. Every time he passed the house the crow would say, "Old ——." Then the lady tried to sue the man for shooting her crow. HAROLD.

How could the judge decide who was guilty—the lady for teaching her crow, which she had a right to do, the crow for obeying his mistress and saying what was probably true, or the gentleman for killing the crow in self-defense—from public insult?

This finishes the pets—except the cats; there is a whole "stack" of them!

The Sunday School

Lesson for April 11 Acts 10 and 11: 1-18

CONVERSION OF CORNELIUS

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

Up to the time of this lesson the gospel had been preached to Jews, to Samaritans, who observed the law of Moses, and to Jewish proselytes. Now a greater step is made than any hitherto in broadening the church. Uncircumcised Gentiles are received into the church. Henceforth men of every nation who fear God and work righteousness are to be regarded as worthy the fellowship of Christians. The way this was brought about is here described:

1. The vision of Cornelius. He was a Roman captain, commanding Roman soldiers, stationed in Judæa to enforce the collection of its revenues for his nation. Yet he worshiped the God of the conquered Jews, and gave generously to the poor Jews in Cæsarea. His family and some, at least, of his soldiers followed his example. Still he held honorable office in the Roman army and served faithfully the nation which Jews hated above all others. Was Cornelius an accepted child of God? So the record in Acts declares. God was pleased with his gifts to the poor, heard his prayers and answered them, and honored them with a special revelation. Was he a Christian? Not yet. He was an outside saint. He had acknowledged no allegiance to Jesus Christ. But he lived up to his light. He had found the true God, doubtless through the Jewish Scriptures in the Greek version. A man who recognized an angel as promptly as he did would recognize the true character and mission of Jesus Christ when these should be presented to him.

The New Testament leaves us in no doubt that there were many such outside saints of that generation. One of them Jesus declared possessed a nobler type of faith than he had found among Jews [Luke 7: 9]. Another, in command at the cross where Jesus was crucified, testified there that Jesus was the Son of God. Another conducted Paul as a prisoner to Rome and showed him great kindness. No one has the right to say that such godly men outside the church were peculiar to that time. They are to be found in every nation—objects of God's approving love—and somewhere and in some way Christ is to be revealed to them as their Saviour and Lord. Whoever prays earnestly, and lives as the conscience of a praying man prompts him to live, is acceptable to God. His prayers and deeds go up for a memorial before God. He has reason to expect further light from above according to his need.

2. The vision of Peter. He had been preparing for this by Christ's teaching, which he had not before understood, by successive events in the ten years' history of the church and by the enlarging processes of his own mind. But his Bible gave him definite instructions what and with whom he might eat, and he had faithfully obeyed these instructions as the word of God. Now there came to him another word of God, which contradicted that which he had learned. Can we have such experiences now and trust them? The food which the Bible had forbidden Peter to eat appeared to be let down from heaven before him, cleansed by God. He had become wise enough to see that a word of God was not less a word of God because it was adapted only for a time that was passing away, and he was open-minded enough to receive and obey a new message for a new time.

I stood one day on the roof of the house in Joppa which is reputed to have belonged to Simon the tanner. Whether or not it is in the same place, it answers the conditions. It is by the seaside. The remains of an ancient tannery are near by. The odor of food in process of cooking was in the air. I looked over the side of the house, and in the street below I saw a number of people cooking over small fires. Fish of all sorts were being prepared and served to the fishermen and others who came up from the beach. It seemed to me that there might be in the motley mess "all manner of four-footed beasts and creeping things of the earth and fowls of the heaven." I wondered if the same things were going on there while Peter was praying, and if they had anything to do with suggesting the vision which he saw.

3. Peter's sermon. He found his vision explained and confirmed by the messengers from Cornelius. By taking one step at a time as he was directed he came to see the full meaning of the message. He followed the men when they told him what they wanted. He found an audience ready to hear him and he preached to them the gospel—how winningly and fittingly! This in substance was what he said: I have been taught of God to look with respect on all men. Though I am a Jew you are just as acceptable to God as I am if you fear him and live righteously. You have already heard of the good tidings of peace through Jesus of Nazareth, the Messiah of the Jews. He is Lord of all persons, of Romans as well as Jews. God anointed him with the Holy Spirit and with power. He went about doing good, healing the sick and freeing men from the power of the devil. We saw him doing these things all through the land of the Jews. They crucified him. But God raised him from the dead the third day, and we saw him after his resurrection and ate and drank with him. He commanded us to preach to men who he is and what he does for those who believe on him. He told us to tell men that God had appointed him to be the Judge deciding the final destinies of the living and the dead. All the prophets point to him, and declare that through his life and work and saving power whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins. This was the substance of the gospel. It is the gospel for today. We have only to take it and apply it to ourselves, and the gift of God which came to Cornelius and his household will come to us.

4. The effect of Peter's sermon. That was twofold. First, on the Gentiles. They had not even been baptized. They had only welcomed the gospel as Peter preached it, but the Holy Spirit had been given to them. Second, on the Jewish disciples. They were amazed. But why should the symbol of the union of these Gentiles with Christ be withheld? The only reason which could be urged was that it was a new thing and the church had made no rule that it should be done. But Peter made the rule without hesitation and commanded that the Gentiles should be baptized at once. No wonder that the apostles and brethren at Jerusalem vehemently opposed his act. But he defended himself simply by saying, "If then God gave unto them the like gift as he did also unto us, when we believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, who was I, that I should withstand God?"

This question is one for us to ponder also. Can any man forbid that Christians should give fellowship to all those who show in their lives the fruits of the Holy Spirit? Are we called to any enlargement of views in these days, when all who claim to follow Christ, while bearing different names, are coming to look one another in the face and to consider together how the gospel may be given to the whole world?

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM

ISAAC SHARP, THE TRAVELING QUAKER MISSIONARY

BY REV. JAMES JOHNSTON

Among the saints of the nineteenth century should be ranked this venerable member of the Society of Friends, who has won a hallowed place in the hearts of thousands of God's children in many lands and climes. By quiet and untiring proclamation of the truth over the whole wide world during the past sixty years, Isaac Sharp stands in line with such men as the late Dr. Somerville or George Müller, living:

> By faith and not by sight,
> By love and not by law.

Isaac Sharp was born in England, April 7, 1806. In youth he had few opportunities for improvement, and consequently his education was limited, but, though lacking in book-learning and in worldly substance, it has been his privilege to make a series of almost unparalleled evangelical journeys for the salvation of men, for the glory of God and for the extension of his kingdom. Having a profound belief in a direct call from the great Head of the Church, this Quaker preacher has ventured for more than half a century to go forth again and again on the King's business and in his strength to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ in various countries and to hold up the hands of those who were laboring to bring souls into the kingdom. Not a few of the missionaries whom he found enduring lives of hardship and stress were cheered and strengthened to a renewal of trust and patience by his visits. In words of glowing faith the saintly Friend testifies to the guidance and power of the Spirit through him in all parts of the earth. Though he declares himself utterly unworthy of such a call, his consecration has been like that of Henry Martyn, when he exclaimed, "Henceforth let me burn out for God!"

Isaac Sharp has visited missionaries and their flocks in Africa, Madagascar, New Zealand, Australia, China, Japan and Mexico. In northern latitudes he has trodden the shores of Norway, which he first entered in 1846, Sweden, Denmark, the Faroe Islands, seventeen in number, Greenland, Labrador and Iceland, where he traveled in the footsteps of Ebenezer Henderson. To these journeyings must be added two trips across America from the Pacific to the Atlantic seaboards and two recent evangelical tours through Syria and Palestine. The last of these, completed in 1895 when nearly ninety years of age, left this unwearied worker in fair health and full vigor of mind.

Feeling the constraining love of Christ and following the custom of the Friends, he has invariably spread his plans before his fellow-members of the Society previous to going forth. He relates that they, having sat together in silence and listened, were wont to wait upon the Lord for heavenly direction and to know the mind of Christ. Very solemn and uniting seasons some of these have been. One especially he records, when he was "liberated," that is, set free, for a trip of continuous travel, occupying six years from 1877 to 1884. Then, after having passed the age of threescore and ten, he was enabled to girdle the earth in a service of love.

The sojournings already mentioned represent a year and a half in Africa, including 800 miles of travel inland, a year in Madagascar, two years in Australia, Tasmania and New Zealand. On these occasions he enjoyed opportunities of fellowship with every branch of Christendom and alludes in appreciative terms to leading missionaries belonging to the churches of Europe and America. Of these he pays a special tribute to the missionary statesmanship and splendid personality of the veteran Dr. Griffith John of Hankow, a representative of the London Missionary Society.

Upon the past Isaac Sharp looks back with reverent thanksgiving that God should have granted to him a share in such blessed service. In recounting his mission wanderings before the "meetings for sufferings," i. e., conferences to receive the reports of deputations, Isaac Sharp's zeal and joy might fittingly be embodied in the words of the Quaker poet:

> Who calls the glorious service hard?
> Who deems it not its own reward?
> Who, for its trials, counts it less
> A cause of praise and thankfulness?

At the eventide of life's long day he dwells near to God at Stratford-on-Avon, where he enjoys a wonderful use of his faculties. The attractive portrait, taken within the past two or three years, which we are able to present, gives some idea of his strong, kindly personality.

OUR OWN WORK

New Micronesian Station. Letters from Mr. Price report satisfactory progress in the new mission station of the Ruk Archipelago, which has been moved from Anapauo on the island of Vela to Kutua on the island of Toloas. Concerning evangelistic work at this new point he writes: "It is altogether novel to the people, and has only been pleasant to us. We have no church building and we have had to improvise a place for meeting, but we have had a good attendance at all our services and one by one the people have put away their heathen ways and taken on a new life. When we came here there was hardly a person decently dressed, and our audiences were almost entirely untouched heathen. Gradually a change came over them. By some means they got hold of clothes, and now we have a well-dressed company at service every Sunday." Church attendance has ranged from 125 to 250, and the Sunday school has averaged about 130. The total number of pupils in regular day schools is fifty, while there are eighty-five under daily instruction. Promising openings on neighboring villages have resulted from the efforts of two chiefs to have Christianity taught to their people. Mr. Price describes an interesting interview with one of these rulers in the current Missionary Herald.

Signs of the Times in Central Turkey. One of our workers in Aintab writes that the great Moslem fast of Ramazan has been observed with more than usual strictness this year, constant vigilance being shown in enforcing the appointed rules in regard to fasting and worship. Even the old custom, for many years fallen wholly into disuse, of punishing delinquents, has been revived. Several Moslems, found neglectful of the required observances, have been publicly disgraced by being led through the streets with blackened faces, followed by a hooting crowd of boys and zealots. "It is a question," writes our correspondent, "how far such methods will secure the sanction and approval of the men who make public opinion in this land. Many had supposed that the day of such things had passed even in Turkey. The chief significance of this movement is found in the fact that it is one of a system of measures intended to promote the restoration of old-time conditions and practices." There are, however, some cheering indications of quiet and order in Aintab. Prisoners who have been confined for political offenses during the past year have been released. A large number of soldiers on duty in the city have been sent to their homes, and there is a hopeful increase in the amount and character of the intercourse between the races.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN

Topic, April 11–17. The Brotherhood of Man. 1 John 3: 1–24.

Popular as this idea is today, the thing for which it stands is as old as the New Testament. It is not a discovery of socialists and sand-lot orators; it is a truth for which the world is indebted to Jesus Christ. One reason, perhaps the main reason, why he told the parable of the prodigal son was to show how hard it sometimes is for the man who has never gone astray to recognize as his brother him who has erred. The elder son was willing to speak of the returning prodigal as "thy son," but what his father insisted on was, he is "thy brother." It is possible, on the one hand, to admit that members of the human family spring from a common father, while at the same time practically denying the brotherhood of man. On the other hand, we may talk beautifully about the brotherhood of man, and the obligations which it involves, without recognizing the fatherhood of God, on which the doctrine of human brotherhood absolutely depends. Those who prize their personal relations to their heavenly Father must make room in their religion for the idea of brotherhood. Those who are enthusiasts for the brotherhood of man, and want to see it more generally realized throughout the world, must understand that what makes us brothers is the fact that we have one common Father in heaven and one Elder Brother who belongs to us all.

We ought to be encouraged by the growing spirit of brotherliness, both within the church and outside of it. Charles Kingsley in Alton Locke represents that shrewd Scotchman, Sandy MacKaye, as deprecating the idea of brotherhood as illustrated in the churches of half a century ago. "Gin they meant 'brothers,'" says he, "they'd say 'brothers,' but because they don't mean 'brothers,' but something formal and perfunctory, they say 'brethren.'" We do not believe that represents the actual sentiment of those who are most active in the church today. Certainly if they saturate themselves with the teachings of Jesus and with this marvelous first epistle of John those who call themselves Christ's followers will realize that "this is his commandment, That we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, even as he gave us commandment."

The best thing we can do with this doctrine is to bring it down from the region of fine-spun theory and try to illustrate it day by day. Begin by being a brother to the man who sits at your own fireside, who works at the same bench with you, who is studying the same books and moving in the same social circles. In that way, and that way only, will you know anything about the real meaning of the idea.

Parallel verses: Deut. 15: 7; 24: 14, 15; Prov. 3: 27, 28; Jer. 22: 13; Rom. 12: 20.

What could be more significant of the waning of Christianity than that Christians should actually be gravely discussing whether people who deny any present communion with Christ at all may not be as good Christians as those whose life habit it is.—British Weekly.

BOOK REVIEWS

MODERN READER'S BIBLE—ISAIAH

Professor Moulton's Modern Reader's Bible has now reached the Prophecy series, which begins with the volume on Isaiah. High praise is awarded on all sides both to the idea and the execution of this series, praise in which we have repeatedly joined. If nothing had been attempted except to arrange chapters and sections like those of a modern book, even this would have been well worth doing. But there is much besides, and the time has come to inquire whether more has not been attempted than any one man can well execute.

It is pleasing to many people to see the so-called higher critics, who have been beset of late by the "archæologists," attacked from another quarter by the literary critics. It seems like a shrewd flank movement when Professor Moulton takes each book of the Old Testament as it leaves its last reviser and estimates its literary quality. But in truth all branches of Biblical investigation are so interdependent—and in the book of Isaiah so far from achieving a consent of the competent—that many students for many years to come must bring their separate contributions, each checking his work by that of others, before the whole can be successfully co-ordinated in the manner here undertaken.

The very text is still conjectural at numerous points. Professor Moulton's metrical theories are interesting, but largely subjective. The same is true of his interpretation of particular difficulties (e. g., in chapter VII.). The sum of our criticism is that the book is a most welcome aid to the study of Isaiah, but that it bristles with theories as to which the ordinary reader should simply suspend judgment. DR. HARRIS'S TREATISE ON GOD

The full title of this work is God the Creator and Lord of All. The author, Prof. Samuel Harris of Yale University, is well known as one of the most profound of American thinkers and theological teachers, and this work apparently embodies the results of the studies of a lifetime. The four great divisions of the work discuss God as the one only absolute Spirit, as the Creator, as the Lord of all in providential government, and as the Lord of all in moral government. It presents what may be called the traditional views of the Almighty in modern language, with great fullness and with exceptional clearness and power. It takes issue to some extent with the current doctrine that the fatherhood of God is the feature of his relation to men which should be most prominently kept in view, and it puts more emphasis than is now customary upon God's sovereignty as Lord of all. Thus it approaches the subject from the old-time point of view rather than that now ordinarily occupied, yet it is a thoroughly modern work. The author is master of the literature of his subject, and nowhere is his power of keen analysis and shrewd argument displayed more effectively than in dealing with the positions of such modern writers as Mr. Balfour, Principal Fairbairn, Mr. Kidd and the late Professor Drummond. He is also familiar with the teachings of the German and French theological specialists, and makes masterly use of material drawn from such sources.

In the opening chapter he discusses the intellectual element in religion, pointing out its essential value to Christian belief and character, as well as to the preaching of the gospel. In succeeding chapters he considers God as the absolute Spirit, the absolute Being and the absolute in respect to reason, will and feeling. Several chapters are devoted to the doctrine of the Trinity, which is defended, explained and enforced with conspicuous fullness and definiteness, yet without attempting to be wise beyond what is written. In the discussion of creation great pains are taken to explain the sense in which God does all things for his own glory, and the obligation of men to glorify God. In the chapters which relate to the government of God in providence the subject of the relation of divine government to human freedom is elaborated, and the significance of God's providential government in relation to redemption. A chapter on special providences at this point is of much interest. Then, in the realm of moral government, moral character is defined psychologically, and its law, its aspects of benevolence and righteousness, and the essential selfishness of society are explained, and the later chapters discuss the expression of love in trust and service, and the practical application of such truths to daily human life. The final chapter deals with the Christian doctrine of civil government.

We might indicate the character and purport of the author's line of thought more in detail, but it is sufficient to say, as we already have suggested, that it is the system of theology in the main which has been generally held and taught in New England during the latter part of the current century, with such modifications only as an exceptionally sturdy and enlightened mind has found itself making, and presented with a lucidity and a persuasiveness which such treatises rarely possess in the same degree. It is a massive work, one which might even be called monumental, and affords a striking contrast to such immature and unconvincing volumes of theology as many which are offered to the world in these days, some of which win a no small degree of applause. Some of the author's positions are different from those which other able and equally conscientious thinkers advocate, but no one can afford to disregard the reasonings by which he maintains them. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.00.]

STORIES

The Descendant [Harper & Bros. $1.25], by some unnamed author, is a powerful study of heredity in the form of a modern novel. It describes the childhood, struggles, influence and failure of a man born with a grievance against society, who becomes a rank Socialist, but who lacks stability enough to be true either in affection or in loyalty to his avowed social ideals. His career is dramatic, brilliant and pitifully sad, and the story of it is told with picturesque force. The book, indeed, is much above the average in both ability and in interest, but it emphasizes too strongly the gloomy and depressing side of life. A wiser literary artist, it seems to us, also would have portrayed the hero either as satisfied with his first love, so that the second would have failed to sway him, or else as recognizing in the former at a much earlier point in their relations the lack of that which he admired and desired so strongly in the second.——Robert Herrick's The Man Who Wins [Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents] is another study of heredity, and this, too, is a skillful picture of certain types and of their somewhat depressing fortunes. Fortunately it is not very long. We will not say that it is not true to life, but it is safe to say that it is not a fair picture of most life. That many a hopeful career develops into commonplace existence, like that of the hero here, undoubtedly is true.

No Place for Repentance [A. D. F. Randolph & Co. 75 cents], by Ellen F. Pinsent, tells the story of a struggle against intemperate habits, the strain of which imbitters and, so far as is here indicated, spoils the happiness of a useful life. The story is well told and is free from anything like cant, and one cannot help feeling that the lapse of years might enable a more hopeful situation to develop itself in the lives of the leading characters, only the beginning of whose story is narrated.——White Satin and Homespun [A. D. F. Randolph & Co. 75 cents], by Katrina Trask, is a brighter story. It shows the power of true manliness and of the realities of life to awaken the dormant spirit of self-sacrifice and service in the heart of a worldly society girl, and the short story is graphically and interestingly told.——Simon Ryan, the Peterite [A. D. F. Randolph & Co. 75 cents] is by Rev. Dr. Augustus Jessop, and is an entertaining, and by no means uninstructive, picture of a most eccentric man and of the outcome of his religious hallucinations. It is a character study of much interest, and should warn all readers against religious monomania.——The Voyage of the Rattletrap [Harper & Bros. $1.25] is by Hayden Carruth, and describes in a serio-comic vein a wagon journey in Dakota, in making which three young companions traveled for something like a thousand miles, living in their wagon, doing their own cooking and meeting with a variety of amusing adventures. It is a lively account of a somewhat unusual open air experience.

BIOGRAPHICAL

The Life of Hosea Ballou, 2nd, D. D. [E. P. Guild & Co. $2.50] has been written by Mr. H. S. Ballou. Dr. Ballou was the first president of Tufts College and for many years eminent, not only in this region but throughout the country, as one of the foremost leaders of the Universalist denomination. He was a man of lofty and inspiring character and scholarly abilities, of much executive force as a man of affairs, a recognized intellectual chief and concerned with the leading denominational periodicals, and eminent, also, as a preacher and pastor. This account of him is pleasantly readable, and if it be open to the criticism of regarding him wholly through rose-colored glasses, it is only fair to add that such a character as his almost invariably makes winsome impressions. That one does not believe wholly in his theology does not blind one to the excellence of his character and reputation. The biographer, however, has gone more into small details than was wise, and some of his examples of his subject's eminence among his friends as a wit and a poet hardly will strike the impartial reader as worthy of being printed. Dr. Ballou never was as famous a man as some of his contemporaries, but certainly deserves the honor due to a well-rounded, beautiful and eminently useful life, and this volume will find a warm welcome among Universalists, and to some extent beyond the limits of that body.

The Memoirs of Marshal Oudinot, Duc de Reggio [D. Appleton & Co. $2.50] have been compiled by Gaston Stiegler and translated into English by Alexander Teixera de Mattos. They are made up largely from the hitherto unpublished papers of the Duchess de Reggio. Oudinot needs no introduction to that large body of readers interested in the life and times of Napoleon I. He helped to make much of the most important part of the Napoleonic history. A brilliant soldier, he was also a successful administrator and a man of some social distinction, but he was, first and foremost, a military hero. He was wounded at least twenty times, often severely, but invariably recovered sufficiently to continue his indefatigable and daring services. The duchess, who was his second wife, but whose married life with him continued for many years, apparently kept full notes of his career, and these have been written out into a connected narrative, which is the more interesting because originally it was not intended for publication, but apparently merely for their children. Moreover, although it is inspired by the devotion of a loving wife to a greater degree than the narrative of an impartial person would have been, nevertheless the intensity of her interest imparts a special charm, and also causes the introduction of many details which would have been lacking in the reports of any one else. The book affords a vivid picture of French society under Napoleon and the king, of military affairs, and especially of the terrible retreat from Russia, which Madame Oudinot personally witnessed. A great deal of light also is thrown on current politics, and many famous men and women, royal, imperial or noble, appear upon the scene from time to time, and the reader seems to be looking upon a picturesque panorama and to hear its successive scenes described with unvarying freshness and intense interest. The book will take a good place in the literature of the Napoleonic era.

The long series of volumes on French history and society by M. Imbert de Saint Amand is not yet ended. Louis Napoleon and Mademoiselle de Montijo [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50], translated by Elizabeth G. Martin, appears to be the opening work of another series dealing with more recent times. It describes the career of the Emperor Napoleon III. down to his marriage with the Empress Eugenie, also outlining more briefly, but with considerable detail, her own history. The author is a loyal admirer of the emperor, not wholly blind to his defects, but much more inclined to justify them than to condemn, and convinced of the lofty aims, high purpose and conspicuous success, on the whole, of his hero. If his point of view be borne in mind, the reader will find the book extremely interesting and will gather from it a satisfactory idea of the personal character and earlier achievements or failures of its hero. Certainly there was much which was romantic and picturesque in the story, and even in the character, of Louis Napoleon III., and the present author possessed exceptional opportunities for informing himself in regard to his subject and has written with an enthusiasm which the reader must enjoy.

Robert the Bruce and the Struggle for Scottish Independence [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50] is an addition to the Heroes of the Nations series, by Sir Herbert Maxwell, M. P. The early period of Scottish history to which the reader is taken back is not so familiar as later periods, and the mediæval manners and ideas increase the attractiveness of the story. The author has written a vivid and very attractive book, illustrating critical scholarship as to doubtful points and throwing light upon them successfully. Frequent photographs and maps add to the reader's pleasure, and the book certainly is one of the best of the series to which it belongs.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Middle Period [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75], by Prof. J. W. Burgess, is one of the American History series and covers the years from 1817 to 1858, the period subsequent to the War of 1812 and antecedent to that of the Rebellion, the period during which our nation was taking shape and forming character, in which rival theories of the interpretation of our Constitution and the operation of our political system were contending for mastery, and in which, especially, the great subject of slavery was gradually dividing the nation and preparing the way for the final struggle by means of which it was abolished. Such matters as the familiar conflicts of opinion over the United States Bank, nullification, the admission of Texas and Oregon, the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, the execution of the fugitive slave law and the Kansas struggle are elaborated with considerable detail. The author is a graphic and vigorous writer, and has sought diligently to preserve an impartial temper. In this he generally has succeeded, but some of his views so far contravene opinions hitherto accepted that they are certain to be called in question. For example, his violent condemnation of the character and actions of John Brown in Kansas. It seems to be clear that the slaughter of Dutch Henry by Brown's party was a cold-blooded murder, but we never before have seen it claimed that Brown and his followers were ordinary cut-throats and robbers, and we believe the truth to be that, unjustified though they were, they were fanatics whose private character was unexceptionable and who took the law into their own hands, without excuse truly, but from no ordinary or contemptible motive. The book makes it easy for the reader to inform himself intelligently and sufficiently about the period which it covers, and is a welcome addition to the series.

The third volume of Herbert Spencer's The Principles of Sociology [D. Appleton & Co. $2.00] concludes the author's works on the Synthetic Philosophy. It contains the sixth, seventh and eighth parts of that work, that is, those dealing with ecclesiastical, professional and industrial institutions, respectively. The two first divisions have already been printed and need no special comment. The third, dealing with industrial institutions, treats of production, distribution, the division and regulation of labor, guilds, free labor and contract, trades unionism, co-operation, socialism, etc. Mr. Spencer's familiar characteristics appear throughout. He has gathered abundant facts by a wide range of observation and generalizes from them. That he sometimes is too hasty in his generalization seems clear, yet in the main he is cautious in his inferences. Apparently he anticipates little in the way of the improvement of the world from the schemes of the socialists, but grants the possibility that some benefit ultimately may arise from that quarter. He looks also for a future time when a peace-maintaining federation of nations shall forbid war, and maintain an equilibrium between the inner faculties and the outer requirements of mankind, when adaptations of the social state shall go on unhindered, and when the private needs of the individual may coincide, and be understood to coincide, with the needs of the public. The volume is more interesting as a treasury of information than for its inferences, but it concludes fittingly a work of considerable importance to the world.

Mrs. H. R. Palmer in Grecian Days [F. H. Revell Co. $2 50] has put into a pleasant form the notes and sketches which she prepared during travels with her husband in Greece. Her volume is peculiarly timely just at present. Its contents, however, include little which is new, but they afford a pleasant blending of personal experiences as a tourist with archæological and historical information. To be sure, it does not contain a great deal of general material, and that only what any guide-book would supply, but it is agreeably offered. There are a few illustrations and the book is handsomely bound.——Gustav Freytag's Martin Luther [Open Court Pub. Co. $1.00] has been translated by H. E. O. Heinemann, and it supplies a brief, terse, compact, yet sufficiently extended, study of Luther's character and history. It is illustrated and well printed. It does not go very deeply into its subject but, as far as it undertakes to analyze and describe the hero, the work is satisfactory.

The Dog [F. Warne & Co. $1.00] is the combined work of "Stonehenge," apparently some author of recognized repute in connection with the subject, and of Dr. George Armatage. In the first part the dog and his habits are discussed, the various breeds being described and illustrated so that the reader of the book can learn readily what their essential points should be. The balance of the work is devoted to the subjects of health and disease, and to the general management of dogs, so that the book is well adapted for household use. All sorts of ailments and their treatment are described and the reader who keeps a dog, and who desires to be at once intelligent and humane in his treatment of his canine friend, will value such a book as this highly.

NOTES

—— Mr. G. W. Cable is to conduct one of the departments of Current Literature after April 1.

—— The present Lord Tennyson's life of his father, the late poet laureate, will be in two volumes and will be out next October.

—— Mrs. Lathrop, Hawthorne's daughter, in her forthcoming volume of memoirs of her father, is to include a portrait of him never before published.

—— Last year 3,300 books by American authors were made in the United States, 1,261 by English or other foreign authors were made here, and 1,142 were imported.

—— Mr. Richard Harding Davis has left the New York Journal and has gone to England to write up the celebrations of the queen's jubilee for Harper's Magazine, the staff of which he has again joined.

—— The autograph manuscript of Keats's Endymion recently changed owners in London for $3,475, and that of Lamia for $1,525. Keats would have been astonished could he have obtained those sums for them during his lifetime.

—— The famous Saturday Review of London has been purchased by Mr. Alfred Beit, a partner of the equally famous Cecil Rhodes. The Saturday Review has been one of Mr. Rhodes's bitterest critics and it is charged that he thus has taken steps to silence it.

—— Carew Hazlitt's Four Generations of a Literary Family, recently published in England, contains so many injudicious personalities that it has had to be withdrawn from sale. It has made a great stir. It is a sad pity to wreck a good book on a rock so easily avoidable.

There are traditions and traditions, family and otherwise. Seldom do men consciously establish habits and laws governing their own conduct, much less those who follow after them; but when they do it is always well to scrutinize the act to see if it be good and worthy of imitation. Rev. Dr. C. F. Hoffman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, long known as a generous man of great wealth, recently died. In his will was found the following clause:

> In conclusion, I give to my beloved wife and children my priestly and paternal blessing, and I would suggest their devoting at all times at least one-tenth of their income to religious and charitable purposes, and that they make family tradition of this practice by incorporating a similar suggestion and provision in any last will and testament that may be made by any of them.

Multiply men with such a spirit, families with such a tradition, and how swiftly the better day for which men sigh would dawn!

BRITISH FREE CHURCH PARLIAMENT

AN UNPRECEDENTED GATHERING IN LONDON

BY OUR ENGLISH EDITOR.

The second National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches of England and Wales in London, March 9, 10 and 11, was the most representative, and in every way the most remarkable, gathering of Nonconformists that has ever assembled in this country. Some 400 local federations of Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Baptist, Free Episcopal and Quaker churches sent 850 delegates, who directly represented 11,000 congregations and, according to Mr. Price Hughes's estimate, indirectly 7,000,000 Free Church Christians. The sessions were also attended by 400 personal members and the general public. The City Temple, in which the meetings, excepting two in the Memorial Hall, were held, proved wholly inadequate to accommodate the crowds. In every respect the council was a complete success. Its most striking and most hopeful characteristic was the all-prevalent sense of fundamental unity and Christian brotherhood. Again and again was it joyfully remarked, "In how little we differ, in how much we agree!" Contemplating the almost unprecedented spectacle in this country of leading representatives of all the evangelical Nonconformist churches sitting side by side as a deliberative body, one felt that much good must result from this mingling of separately-molded types. The scene was solemn, impressive, thrilling. A new era has dawned in the ecclesiastical and religious history of England. The assembly seemed uplifted with a holy buoyancy, as of men inspired by a new hope, suddenly conscious of unsuspected strength, realizing an inheritance which has long been within their reach, but which, through undue concentration upon themselves and their immediate circle, they have failed to appropriate.

The arrangement by which country delegates were sent to the houses of friends belonging to other communions worked most happily. Several offers of hospitality were accepted from members of the Established Church. Dr. Mackennal and Dr. Berry were the guests of the Archdeacon of London, Dr. William Sinclair, of whom The Congregationalist's Pilgrims must retain pleasant recollection. Dr. Barrett stayed with Canon Gore, the Bishops of London and Rochester each entertained a Wesleyan College professor, whilst Canon Scott Holland opened his house to a Baptist minister.

A deeply religious tone pervaded the entire proceedings. Every sederunt, including business sessions, opened and closed with devotional exercises. During prayer the platform set the example of the kneeling posture. Dr. Monro Gibson and Mr. Price Hughes sought to add dignity to their office as president and vice-president of the council by wearing gown and hood. For the most part the assembly expressed its feeling vocally instead of by the action of hands and feet. At the closing session gratitude was expressed for the manifested presence of God at every sitting. More than once it was insisted that the council is not a merely political or social but an essentially spiritual movement. Dr. Mackennal rejoiced that "the Free Churches have found their meeting point in the revival of the church doctrine for which Barrowe and Greenwood died, which has endeared to us the name of John Robinson, and given broad and abiding foundation to the United States."

A striking feature of the council has been the assertion of the actuality of the church as a true spiritual body in living contact with Christ, with a continuity of Christian consciousness both throughout the ages and now in every communion and every land. The address from the chair and Mr. Price Hughes's opening sermon gave direct expression to this idea. It was involved in Dr. Berry's and Dr. Barrett's sermons, in which the sense of Christ was made the ground of certitude in Christian believing. The council has this year given greater expression than ever to the constructive, as contradistinguished from the protesting part, of the work of the reformed churches. And this is attracting attention from members of the High Church party in the Church of England. Some of these have not scrupled to say that this conception of the church's continuity and catholicity and actuality as consisting in the Christian consciousness in fellowship with the living Christ is a nobler conception than their own, and it is attracting interest and attention from High Churchmen who do not go so far as this.

The most memorable ecclesiastical event in the history of the city of London fittingly opened with a reception of delegates at the Mansion House by the lord mayor, whose extreme cordiality was all the more appreciated that he is a member of the Hebrew faith. His princely hospitality and liberal spirit were dramatically contrasted by Dr. Parker with the action of his sixteenth century predecessor in the mayoralty, by whose orders Anne Askew was burnt on Smithfield because she refused to renounce the Protestant faith.

In his presidential address, instinct with catholic, kindly feeling, whilst surrendering nothing of principle, Dr. Monro Gibson accurately interpreted the mind of the council. His confession that "we have been far too individualistic in our personal religion and too denominational in our church life," struck the keynote of the meetings. After this address the council made it its first business to congratulate the queen on the length, the prosperity and the beneficent results of her reign, and to assure her Majesty of heartfelt loyalty and love. "The queen," said the president of the London council, "has raised no finger against Nonconformity, and has always been on the side of righteousness and truth."

Being of opinion that the spiritual and devotional element should predominate in the council, the committee arranged for each day's proceedings to begin with a sermon, and the large congregations which assembled at nine o'clock three mornings in succession justified their belief that no form of public speech is so acceptable to church members. A leading idea in Mr. Price Hughes's, Dr. Berry's and Dr. Barrett's discourses was that the seat of authority and ground of certitude in religion is the experience and consciousness of the individual Christian. Said Dr. Barrett: "We believe in the authority of the Bible because we believe in Christ"; said Mr. Hughes: "The Protestant does not accept the truth of the teaching of Scripture because he acknowledges its authority; he acknowledges the authority of Scripture because he accepts the truth of its teaching." Similarly in regard to the church, Dr. Barrett said, "It is the certitude creates the church, rather than the church creates the certitude." Both Mr. Hughes and Dr. Barrett affirmed that faith cannot be touched by the higher criticism. The latter stated that if faith were wise it would keep out of the fray, that he had no sympathy with those who regard criticism as the foe of faith, and that "these panic fears are unworthy of us all." Mr. Hughes remarked on the entire and intense orthodoxy of the council: "Nothing has evoked such prompt and unanimous applause as any reference to the doctrine of the cross, our loyalty to Jesus, our belief in the Bible as the inspired Word of God, and our determination to put all our trust, even for the accomplishment of social reform, in the old, old gospel which is always new."

Deep and bitter disappointment, to use Dr. Parker's words, was occasioned by Dr. McLaren's inability to preach the annual council sermon. Knowing the extreme fineness of the Manchester preacher's nervous organization, Mr. Mackennal believed the breakdown was due to his acceptance of the invitation. Dr. McLaren sent a friendly message to the council. At short notice Dr. Parker, who is equal to any emergency, kindly took Dr. McLaren's place, and though lately troubled by his throat looked remarkably fresh and preached with an access rather than diminution of power. His theme was the Suicide of Isolation.

Dr. Rogers and Dr. Clifford were announced to read papers on Free Church Principles. Ignoring medical advice, Dr. Rogers duly appeared and in a quite hilarious mood. An all-wise Providence having denied him the gift of reading a paper, so he said, he gave a sparkling, rousing spontaneous address that one moment set the assembly on a roar and the next stirred its deepest feeling. The oldest man on the platform, he dwelt on the improved position of Nonconformity during the Victorian era, remarking that when the queen came to the throne Mr. Price Hughes in an Oxford M. A. gown would have been an impossibility, and Dr. Fairbairn, who had taken to Oxford a new conception of theological progress and spiritual life, would also have been impossible. Dr. Rogers was proud to be a political dissenter. Whilst rejoicing in the improved relations between Anglicans and Free Churchmen, he emphasized the fact that they were separated by a vital principle. Defining the present aims of the Free Churches, Dr. Clifford asserted that their first business was not the ministration of charity, not the fight for political progress, not social reconstruction, important as these are, but the reconciling of men to the holy and loving will of God.

A paper and discussion on Sunday school reform revealed a resolve to improve methods and machinery. A plea for "one class, one room" found much support. A defense of the International Lesson System did not excite enthusiasm. It was generally agreed that in Christian Endeavor Societies the instruction should be more vigorous and educational and more attention be given to the inculcation of Free Church principles.

The work and influence of women in the churches have always had a prominent place in the council's sessions, and the committee have insisted that foreign missions shall have full consideration. These two elements were combined in addresses by Mrs. M. E Hassé on Moravian missions, and by Mrs. Rendel Harris, who gave a moving account of her work in Armenia. The leaders in the council have made a point of giving place to the holiness movement, believing that such a spirit and purpose as animate the Keswick Convention should be represented within the churches as well as outside them. Accordingly, at the closing session two beautiful and impressive papers were read by Dr. Oswald Dykes (Presbyterian) and Rev. F. W. Bourne (Bible Christian) on The Puritan Type and the Methodist Type of the Spiritual Life, the communion following.

Various public questions were taken up. No disestablishment resolution was moved, but Dr. Rogers, Dr. Parker, Dr. Clifford, Dr. Berry and others made vigorous and outspoken protests against state churchism. A resolution condemning the bill now before Parliament for aiding denominational schools was unanimously carried. A delegate's "rider," advocating the exclusion of religious instruction from Board schools, would have split the assembly had it not been withdrawn. At the young people's meeting Dr. Parker reiterated his protest against "the state church in the day school." Discussing secondary education the council showed strong determination that Free Churchmen shall be proportionately represented on educational trusts, and whilst not allowing Anglicans to monopolize Eton, Harrow, and other great public schools, to strengthen and raise the level of distinctively Nonconformist schools, like Mill Hill, the Leys (Cambridge), Tettenhall, etc. "Poor Armenia" was not forgotten, and a resolution expressing sympathy with the endeavor of Crete to throw off the Turkish yoke led to a remarkable demonstration of approval. A unanimous protest was entered against the proposal in medico-military circles to reintroduce the C. D. acts in India.

The very first act at the business session was the presentation by Dr. Mackennal of a report in regard to the memorial, in favor of arbitration, he was instructed by the Nottingham Council to send to the American churches. Acknowledging the cordial co-operation of the American consul in Manchester and the American ambassador, he mentioned that he had received from Mr. Bayard an autograph letter of a most warm and approving kind. The announcement that the Congregational and Presbyterian churches of America had entered most heartily into the matter gave much satisfaction. Dr. Mackennal rejoiced that the churches on both sides of the Atlantic had done their part to bring about the signing by President Cleveland and Lord Salisbury of the Arbitration Treaty. Earlier in the day Dr. Berry, in his sermon, had said that the spirit of the movement owed more to the churches of the two nations than to statesmen and politicians, and that even if the treaty were not ratified its spirit had passed into the blood of the people, and the day would never dawn when they would come to strife.

In Dr. Mackennal's opinion the most cheering aspect of the council was the manifest vigor of the popular sentiment. The first election for committee under the constitution took place this year, and both in the way in which representatives used their right to nominate and ballot and the admirable choice of members of committee give the highest hope for the future of the council. Inevitably up to this time the official element has been predominant; it is quite clear that this is going to be a popular and self-regulating body.

The success of the council was in no small measure due to the genius of Dr. Mackennal, to whose wisdom and tact, organizing and executive ability, clear sightedness, unflagging zeal and quiet spiritual force testimony was borne by the president, Dr. Parker and others. With much enthusiasm Dr. Clifford (who starts March 17 on a tour round the world and expects to reach Boston in August) was elected president of the council for 1898, when it meets March 8-10 in the ancient city of Bristol.

CLEVELAND'S BETTERING MUNICIPAL LIFE

At the meeting March 8 of the general ministers' meeting, representing all denominations, strong resolutions were passed protesting against Sunday baseball, and a committee was appointed to present them to the management of the club. If necessary to act further, the committee will wait on the legal authorities and insist upon the enforcement of the law. Similar expressions have been adopted by the ministers' meetings of several denominations and by men's clubs in a number of churches. The influence of the leading daily papers continues to be decidedly in favor of enforcing the State law, though the law has been violated in Cincinnati and Columbus.

The recently organized Municipal Association is pursuing the Chicago plan of publishing without fear or favor the public record, education and general character of all candidates for public office. It has issued bulletins with reference to both Republican and Democratic candidates for the city council. Of nineteen Democratic candidates whose education is described the bulletin shows that eight were educated in parochial schools. One Republican was described as having been discharged a year ago from his position as street car conductor for opening fare register boxes. He has since brought suit against the Municipal Association for $25,000 damages, declaring that this public statement caused him to lose the nomination. Of another successful Republican rival in the same district the bulletin said that in a recent public bribery investigation the candidate had sought to prove an alibi by the testimony of a high school boy fifteen years old, to the effect that he went with the candidate to a saloon and remained with him till nearly midnight. It should be stated that these are conspicuous exceptions and the list of candidates comprises many men of excellent character. The bulletins as yet do not make recommendations, but give facts and leave voters to judge for themselves. The president of the association is H. A. Garfield, son of the late ex-president.

The association avowedly seeks to create public sentiment in favor of compensation for street railway and other public franchises. Some of the most valuable franchises expire within the next seven years, and several present franchises contain provisions with reference to reduction of fares of which the city authorities have never taken advantage. In 1896 the legislature passed a law under which the councils of Ohio cities have power to grant franchises for fifty years with certain comparatively unimportant restrictions. In Cincinnati the street railways secured such a franchise, and the present municipal campaign in Cleveland is popularly supposed to involve the fifty-year franchise issue, though none of the candidates have announced themselves as in its favor. Municipal Affairs Clubs are being organized in not a few churches, and the questions of honest and businesslike administration of city affairs are being widely discussed among all classes of people. The Chamber of Commerce recently issued a strong plea for the merit system in city offices. The Daily Plain Dealer, one of the leading papers in Ohio, which is Democratic in national affairs, vigorously demands that in city elections voters shall divide on municipal and not national lines, and has not hesitated to declare in favor of some of the Republican candidates. It is representing with ability the political attitude of the increasing number of intelligent voters who approve the watchword of the National Municipal League, "Municipal government is business, not politics."

Cleveland has passed through the severe financial depression without serious failures in banking or commercial circles. Its financial institutions have justified their reputation for a wise conservatism. Manufacturing establishments are resuming with a gradual increase of business. A recent strike, involving two great ship building companies, and which threatened to be extended and serious, was settled satisfactorily by a frank conference between the employers and their men. The course of several prominent labor leaders in the matter was conservative and wise, winning the confidence both of the employers and the men. Hundreds of men are now at work at excellent wages, and the strikes were settled without any intervention by the authorities. Cleveland's bitter experience last summer, when a prominent manufacturing establishment was guarded by militia for several weeks, has made both manufacturers and trade unionists more conservative and conciliatory, and the widespread discussion of international arbitration undoubtedly has influence in making men exalt the wisdom of arbitration in industrial conflicts.

The Anti-Saloon League is making a vigorous campaign throughout the State. It has called to its service some of the strong men of several denominations. Congregationalists have given to the work Rev. H. H. Russell, Rev. H. M. Ladd, D. D., and Rev. P. W. Sinks, though Mr. Sinks will for a time supply the Euclid Avenue pulpit in Cleveland. The Cleveland superintendent is giving in many churches lectures illustrated by stereopticon views, showing just how members of the last legislature voted on temperance laws.

FLEUR-DE-LIS.

In and About Boston

A Disappointment

Dr. McKenzie was expecting to meet his Monday noon audience in Tremont Temple this week to deliver the last address of the present series, but an unfortunate accident on Friday evening of last week prevented. He had been speaking at a Lenten service in Harvard Church, Brookline, in exchange with Dr. Thomas, and on his way to the electric car, to reach which necessitated haste, he made a mis-step and fell on the curbstone, striking his forehead sharply. It was a narrow escape from something much worse. He was unable to preach in his own pulpit Sunday, and Professor Platner of Harvard Divinity supplied for him. This is only the second time in thirty years' pastorate in which Dr. McKenzie has been unable on account of physical incapacity to fill his pulpit on Sunday.

Two Old South Sermons

Dr. Gordon began by painting a vivid word picture, contrasting the two malefactors. One spoke in mockery and as an impenitent. Christ had no response for him, and the awful warning is thereby given us that men may so place themselves in the great crises of life that they find nothing but a dumb God, a dumb Christ and a dumb universe. Whether there shall be this infinite terrible silence or whether there shall be voices of consolation depends on the disposition, on the heart. On the other hand, the penitent thief did not plead as an excuse an unfortunate environment or the failing of others, but, admitting the justice of his punishment, he cried for mercy. When man's deepest nature cries out for God that alone is true prayer.

Christ's reply to the penitent thief emphasizes personality. "I say unto thee." Christ did not believe that man was only a physical organism, with a finely adjusted nervous system, through which moves the dance of thought and feeling. Christ recalled men to themselves, to their own moral struggle and service. There are too many men today who do not believe in themselves. The second element in Jesus' reply points out the continuity of life. "Today shalt thou be with me." He did not think of the dead as asleep, but as preserving all their spiritual qualities even though they pass out of our sight, as a full-rigged ship disappears in the fog but loses none of its properties.

The third thing emphasized is fellowship. The greatest word of Christ is, "Lo, I am with you always." The Christian life begins in fellowship. You may believe all the creeds from the Nicene and the Westminster and still not be a Christian. The only way to be a Christian is to live with Jesus, to learn the power of his thought, to appreciate the weight of his character, to realize the transcendence of his personality. The life after death is to be one of fellowship, and through Christ we shall be guided to those dear to us who have preceded us into the other world. When we remember who Jesus was, the purity of his character, the incomprehensible altitude of his conception of God, the "otherness" of his spirit, it does not seem wonderful that he should know about the other world.

One of the most striking pulpit utterances of last Sunday was Dr. G. A. Gordon's morning sermon. Not for years has he preached a discourse which has roused so much immediate comment in his congregation, and which has so strongly gripped the consciences of his hearers. Starting with the incident in Pilate's life when he washed his hands and declared himself innocent of the blood of Jesus, Dr. Gordon pointed out plainly the complicity which many persons today have in wrongdoing, even though vainly trying to clear themselves by asserting their lack of sympathy with it. He applied this thought trenchantly to the modern drama, to much of the fiction printed today, and to the Sunday newspaper. The latter he denounced in scathing terms, but he was even more severe upon those who, while admitting the evil character of some things, still patronize them on the ground that they are too strongly entrenched in modern life ever to be uprooted.

The evening discourse was the fourth in the series of words from the cross. This series, now more than half completed, has drawn large congregations and Dr. Gordon has spoken with great directness and spiritual power. He has abandoned the use of notes during most of the Lenten season, and his words go home with great force and impressiveness. The sermon last Sunday evening dealt with the cry of the penitent thief to the Saviour.

The Latest Harvard-Yale Contest

This was not upon the field or upon the water, but upon the platform of Sanders' Theater before an audience representing the culture and intelligence of Cambridge and Boston. Hitherto Yale's list of victories in the series of debates between the two institutions has been considerably shorter than that of Harvard, but the verdict of the judges last Friday evening was in favor of the men from New Haven.

The six contestants, Messrs. Macfarland, Clark and Studinski for Yale and Messrs. Wrightington, Dorr and Dobyns for Harvard, were all manly and able men. While their work on the platform indicated much careful preparation, their speeches were not of the memoriter type. In them the true idea of a debate—thinking on one's feet—found repeated illustration. The speakers were quick in repartee and in readjusting their own lines of argument to the reasoning of their opponents. The Yale men labored under the disadvantage of being unfamiliar with the acoustic properties of the auditorium, hence their delivery did not average as well as that of the Harvard three. They, on the other hand, appeared rather more anxious to carry the audience with them by arts known to the popular orator than to adhere to the precise question at issue.

Indeed, this was the main blemish of the debate—that no common interpretation of the question had been previously reached—and the audience, which had been expecting a straight out discussion of Monometallism versus International Bimetallism, did not have the pleasure of seeing the contestants come to close quarters on this broad and vital issue. Much practical information, however, was set forth by both parties to the discussion, and even those already pretty well versed on the subject discussed must have borne away fresh impressions of the complexity of the underlying problem.

Such a debate as this, which the governor of the commonwealth dignified by accepting the position of presiding officer and which has aroused deep interest in the two college communities most concerned with it, is proof that intellectual interests are, after all, the dominant ones in our centers of learning, that men are being educated there to take broad and comprehensive views of public questions, to form independently their own opinions thereon and to put them in effective language. As Governor Wolcott said in his introductory speech, "The universities represented on the platform stand, and always will stand, for advancement, enlightenment and education. And it is proper that they should be bound together in a bond which does not preclude emulation."

The Young Men's Congregational Club

By way of variety in the series of addresses and talks enjoyed by the Young Men's Congregational Club, a program was carried out at the meeting last week Wednesday distinctly different from that of any previous meeting. After the dinner Rev. Sherrod Soule of Naugatuck, Ct., held the close attention of the club during an extended talk on New World Pilgrims at Old World Shrines, a topic which is suggestive of the pilgrimage conducted by The Congregationalist last summer to England and Holland, and of which the speaker was a member. Combining historical and descriptive elements of the story of the early and later Pilgrims in an informal address, Mr. Soule was aided by a set of stereopticon views which further enhanced the vividness of his account. Twenty-five new members were admitted to membership in the club, making the total about 100.

Ballington Booth in Boston

The hold which the Booths have upon the people of Boston was manifested by the enthusiastic great audience which filled and overflowed Tremont Temple last Sunday afternoon. It was the first visit to this city of Commander Ballington Booth, of the American Volunteers, since the severing of his connection with the Salvation Army. Some well-known features of the army meetings were wanting. The poke-bonneted and uniformed soldiers were conspicuously absent from the platform, but music there was in abundance, some of it rendered by the New York Volunteer concert group. Applause was frequent and hearty, and Commander Booth spoke with all his former fire and force. The trend of his address was intensely patriotic. He dwelt on the loyalty to American principles and American institutions which is behind this new movement, saying, with emphasis, "I can get salvation via Bunker Hill as well as via London Bridge." Another large congregation greeted him at Central Church Sunday evening, when he made a strong appeal for the unchurched.

Pilgrim Hall was crowded on Monday morning by Boston ministers anxious to learn of the distinguishing features of the new movement from the lips of its leader. Here, too, Commander Booth sounded a patriotic note, declaring himself an American by choice, affection and adoption, and adding: "It is true I was born in England, but that was not my fault." After reviewing the progress of the Salvation Army during the ten years of his American commandership, the speaker gave some of his reasons for separation from the old organization, and told the story of the formation of the Volunteers of America. Small as were its beginnings, at the end of a year its leader is able to report fifty staff officers, 500 salaried officers, 4,000 uniformed Volunteers and 3,000 Defenders. A sixteen-page paper, having a circulation of 20,000, is published at the New York headquarters.

The chief work of the Volunteers has been among the criminals. Beginning with Sing-Sing, Mrs. Booth has had remarkable success in speaking to the prisoners in various State institutions, and the new organization sees a great field among the 80,000 persons incarcerated in our prisons and penitentiaries. It is now in touch, through correspondence, with 7,500 prisoners and 1,350 are connected with the Volunteers' Prisoners' League. Efforts are made not only to take saving influences into these institutions, but to meet the men who are coming out with saving influences.

Colonel Blackhurst, leader of the New England regiment, followed the commander with a brief address emphasizing the desire of the Volunteers to be a feeder to the churches. A church member may be a Volunteer, and Volunteers are expected to unite with the church and to partake of the sacraments. Colonel Blackhurst's strong, refined face and dignified bearing will win him friends in New England.

Mt. Holyoke Alumnæ Association

The attractive ladies' café connected with the University Club was opened to the association on Saturday, March 27, for its midwinter meeting. After the luncheon and social hour, Mrs. L. C. Purington was introduced as the mistress of ceremonies. Toasts upon Mary Lyon, the new woman of seventy years ago, Our Benefactors, Our Old Girls, and Mt. Holyoke of the Future were responded to by graduates of the seminary or college. Most fittingly and suggestively did Mrs. Mary A. Stuckenberg, whose college training was received at Lake Erie Seminary—a daughter of Mt. Holyoke—reply to the toast, College Extension. The inspiration she received in school has borne fruit in many lines of service, one being her wish and effort, during a long residence in Germany, to introduce among the German girls a higher Christian training based upon the foundations laid by Mary Lyon.

After a short business session, Mrs. Della Kendall, the presiding officer, presented Miss Clara Stevens, now a teacher at the college, who took her audience on a pilgrimage to South Hadley, and made vivid by her clear word picture the present condition of the college and the hopes and plans for the future. About seventy-five women enjoyed the afternoon together, and joined in heart, if not with voice, in the song sung by the recent graduates, "Holyoke, Holyoke, tried and true, we will love her ever."

In the Interests of Co-operation

A conference on "organized religious work at the South End" was held at the South End House March 22. Among the participants were Dr. C. G. Ames of the Church of the Disciples, Rev. S. L. Loomis of Union Church, Rev. E. L. Atkinson of the Church of the Ascension, Dr. C. A. Dickinson of Berkeley Temple, Lieutenant-Colonel Cozens of the Salvation Army, Dr. G. L. Perin of the Every Day Universalist Church, Rev. Leslie A. Sprague of the New South Church and Church of the Unity, and Mr. Wilson of the Dover Street Rescue Mission.

The topics discussed were the various religious agencies at work in the South End, what each is doing, taken together are they, on the whole, gaining or losing ground, how may each church influence more vitally its neighborhood, how may the churches and other religious agencies co-operate for the moral elevation of the South End?

A second conference at the same place, on the same general subject, will be addressed by Dean Hodges. It is expected that these conferences will result in a more definite understanding and more definite co-operation among the South End religious workers.

Studies in Personal Religion

Dr. Barton of Shawmut Church has begun a series of Sunday evening discourses on Why I Am a Religious Man. The initial sermon was a fine setting forth of the idea that man has an instinctive recognition of a supreme intelligence under all systems of religion. This natural tendency is followed by choice, just as he chooses to be an educated or a civilized being. The second sermon was entitled Why I Am Not an Agnostic. While admitting that agnosticism has had its mission to our over-confident and dogmatic age, the speaker declared that agnosticism is itself dogmatic when it declares God to be "unknown and unknowable," and set forth the positive grounds of our knowledge of God in nature, in history and in the human soul. Later Dr. Barton will tell why he has chosen the Christian religion and after that why he is a Congregationalist. An uncommonly good chorus choir is an additional attraction.

Fortunate is the International Christian Workers' Association in securing for its president a man of the intellectual breadth and virility and the spiritual warmth of Rev. Floyd Tomkins, Jr., D. D., of Providence. The motto which, in the letter accepting the office, he proposes for the association is "All for Jesus."

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS

Reports often reach us, like those this week from Minnesota and California, of a spiritual revival accompanied by renewed interest in the financial prosperity of a church. Usually the heart is moved first, but the fact that this is not always the order shows that faith and works affect each other as do soul and body. That a man's pocketbook is reached through his heart is no oftener true than that his heart is reached through his pocketbook. Though the natural outgrowth of love is service, it must not be forgotten that service often begets love.

Such recourse to the best of recent books and organ music cannot but deepen the spiritual life of that New England church which has adopted a special program with this end in view. The broad invitation which it extends must also go far toward inspiring in the audiences a desire for help.

Discussions on topics of the day at the meetings of a church society in California are a gratifying substitute for the gossip formerly supposed to be inseparable from such gatherings. Truly, the world does move, and in an upward direction.

Mr. Moody and Mr. Murphy are heard from this week in their work at widely separated points, but the results of their efforts suggest that they are losing none of their power over the people.

A Maine church believes in providing entirely for its new enterprise before undertaking it. The temptation to dedicate a debt with the new structure is thus set aside.

We commend to the church militant all over the land a campaign such as a Nebraska church has been waging for the purpose of slaying the dragon of debt.

Nearly sixty of our churches have reported that they are using individual communion cups. A number of others are seriously considering the change.

Why have we not more local church union such as several Massachusetts towns have enjoyed?

Connecticut already has over 300 churches, but now and then, as recently, a new one is added.

A BEACON LIGHT IN THE BERKSHIRES

The Pilgrim Memorial Church of Pittsfield, Mass., was organized in the Peck and Russell Sunday school room, March 14. The neighborhood is a mile and a half from the city, in a manufacturing center where religious work has been encouraged especially by its growth. Over thirty years ago, during the pastorate of Dr. Todd at the First Church, a Sunday school, undenominational in character, was started. It has been conducted ever since with great faithfulness, looking toward the formation of a church in the future. Hence the new church is peculiarly a memorial of the past. Mr. J. L. Peck and Mr. Zeno Russell gave of their best to promote the highest good of the community. To the abiding value of their work, and that of many others, Pilgrim Church will be a perpetual witness.

Last November the older members of the Sunday school voted to have Sunday morning preaching services at the rooms during the winter. Such services have been conducted by Rev. Raymond Calkins, assistant pastor of First Church. The deepened religious interest which has resulted is due largely to his efforts among the people.

As the weeks went on the interest grew and the desire for a church sprang up. At a preliminary meeting, March 8, it was voted to form an independent Congregational church, and fifty-two persons expressed a desire to join; of these thirty were men. The room was filled the following Sunday evening when the business meeting was called. Permanent officers were elected, the covenant and bylaws were adopted and the members repeated in unison the declaration of faith, which was signed by those who became members, seventy-two in number, including thirty-two who came by letter. Of the total membership thirty-seven, more than half, are men.

A meeting for formal organization was immediately called, Dr. W. V. W. Davis of the First Church acting as moderator and Rev. I. C. Smart and Rev. Samuel Harrison, pastors of Pittsfield Congregational churches, participating in the exercises. The covenant was repeated and the church was declared formally organized.

A short sermon by Dr. Davis followed from the text, "Built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief corner stone."

Before the communion a letter signed by Charlotte M. Russell, Jane A. Russell and Henry R. Russell presented to the church a communion and a baptismal service, in memory of Zeno Russell, his wife and children, and bearing the appropriate selection, "Blessed are the dead, who die in the Lord, for their works do follow them." MR. MOODY IN CINCINNATI

The great meetings in Music Hall, March 3–24, have been remarkable. They occasioned the uncommon sight of 5,000 persons hastening through the streets in a drizzling rain to crowd a great hall on a week day afternoon to hear a layman speak about the Holy Spirit. Hundreds also went daily for the half-hour praise service at 7.30, led by Professor Towner and 1,000 voices. No effort was made to count results. Many found Christ; perhaps more backsliders were reclaimed; but, most important, Christians were quickened. Every church in city and suburbs that has taken any interest cannot fail to feel an impetus. It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Moody has preached the gospel, and in answer to the usual question as to the secret of his success he explains, "Go to work, and you will find out."

At the last meeting friends left a great bunch of white roses on a stand for him. With the large bouquet in his hand he stepped forward and said that it would delight him most to give it away. He asked for the children in the audience under twelve years of age to come to the platform, and a great many eager little friends received a flower. It was a beautiful sight—this man, with a multitude of cares, great undertakings, involving hundreds of men and thousands of dollars, all resting upon him, more than 5,000 people waiting to hear him speak, and he standing there as simple and unassuming as if alone with the children. It was a vivid illustration of what he has been doing for forty years. After his brief sermon on The Gospel, he called on Dr. Torrey, whose aid has been much appreciated, especially in his noonday talks bearing on personal work and the Holy Spirit, and at the close hundreds started to the platform to shake hands with Mr. Moody, but were surprised when told that he had gone.

The press has been generally kind. Mr. Moody said he had never labored where there was a more hearty union of the pastors and Christian workers. From all our hearts ascends the prayer concerning him, "God be with you till we meet again." A. A. A.

THE BOULEVARD CHURCH, DENVER, AND THE CHURCH BUILDING SOCIETY

The Church Building Society is severely criticised by certain newspapers on account of its dealings with the Boulevard Church of Denver. The facts in the case, which we have been at some pains to gather, do not appear to warrant the criticism. In 1884 the society made to the church a grant of $500, on condition that the society should receive a mortgage covering that amount and including special contributions toward the building coming from outside the parish. These special gifts, with the $500, amounted to $1,340, and the mortgage was made out for that sum, both parties understanding the conditions. The church agreed to make annual contributions to the society.

In 1894 the church pulled down its building and began to erect a new one on the same lot. The next year it asked the society for an additional grant of $3,000. This not being given, the church asked the society for what sum the mortgage would be released. The church has made to the society seven contributions during the twelve years, and, deducting these from the whole amount, the society offered to release the mortgage for $1,268.62. The church offered to pay back the $500 if the society would release the special gifts. The society offered to do this, provided the donors of these gifts should request it. As the church declined to ask the donors for requests, the secretary of the society, Dr. L. H. Cobb, wrote to the donors and received replies releasing $740. The balance of $100 was raised, and the society released the mortgage, the matter to be settled on payment of the $500. The society had been cited to appear in court in Denver to defend a suit for vacating the mortgage, but the lawyer for the church offered to withdraw the suit and settle out of court on the terms above stated.

The printed rule of the society is as follows:

> The church or society, to which aid has been voted by this society, shall recognize and acknowledge contributions received from other Congregational churches and individuals for aid in building its house of worship, and shall include the same in the mortgage given to this society, that the money thus given to the cause of church building may be preserved from loss.

This rule is, it is to be supposed, understood both by the donors to the society and the churches receiving its aid. The rule has been heartily approved as a proper guarantee that the money intrusted to the society shall be used for the purposes for which it was given, and we do not see how the society could have fulfilled its trust in this case except by the steps it has taken.

It is in part to meet this demand that this publication is undertaken.

Westboro, Rev. M. A. Breed, pastor, has received 11 new members since January and works in hearty fellowship with the other churches, the pastors meeting regularly for conference and study of local needs. Auxiliary was addressed by Miss Alice Kyle of Boston, March 13. A social hour and missionary tea followed.——The Cumberland County Branch of the W. B. M. honored the birthday of its missionary in China, Miss M. S. Morrill, by a large missionary meeting at Second Parish Church, March 25. Prominent auxiliary workers made addresses. The chief speaker was Miss E. M. Stone, recently returned missionary from Bulgaria. The women served a delicious lunch.

South Gardiner.—The past three winters informal Bible readings have been found helpful and have been well attended. Last winter they were held in different neighborhoods and there has been much study of the Bible. The pastor, Rev. A. L. Struthers, has been speaking on A Young Man in and Out of the Bible. Temperance sentiment has been aroused by two spirited meetings.

Gorham.—A building committee for the proposed chapel has been chosen. The whole sum of $10,000 will be secured before work is begun. Only $1,500 remain to be raised. Recently $600 were added to the fund, ex-Governor Robie subscribing $500 in addition to $1,000 previously promised.

Keene.—First. A 15 days' evangelistic campaign was begun March 14, under the direction of Rev. C. L. Jackson and Mr. O. W. Crowell. Excellent results began to appear the first week, but on the second Sunday a great wave of divine gentleness seemed to sweep the congregation. During the Sunday school hour nearly all who were present rose either as Christians or deciding to become such. A large gathering of men was greatly helped at an afternoon meeting. Other churches joined for the evening service. Rev. W. G. Poor is pastor.

Hopkinton.—Union meetings have been held with the Baptists since last December. They culminated in evangelistic meetings under the leadership of Rev. E. A. Whittier. Many unusual cases are reported, especially among the intemperate. About 40 persons signed cards, many of whom gave evidence of conversion.

Arthur, nine were received to membership March 7, and others have expressed a desire to begin the Christian life. The church is growing in spiritual strength, and has gained in general attendance the past year. The Sunday school was never as large. An old-fashioned donation was arranged for the pastor March 18, a sum of money being presented.

Greenwich.—Recently a new church was organized at Steep Hollow in this town, to be known as the North Mianus Church. It is the outcome of a Sunday school organized in 1858, which has flourished ever since in a chapel provided by the churches of the town. Services will be held in the chapel morning and evening Sunday, with Sunday school as usual in the afternoon. A pastor is called already.

By invitation of the church, its two former pastors, Rev. I. W. Metcalf of Cleveland and Rev. R. S. Lindsay of Geneva, took part in the exercises. A letter was also read from Rev. F. W. Gunsaulus, who for nearly a year was pastor of the mission from which the church was afterward organized. The church occupies a fine location in the growing eastern part of the city. During Mr. Lindsay's pastorate it dedicated the S. S. rooms in a building which, when completed, will cost about $40,000. The church is united and vigorous, and large congregations have greeted the new pastor from the first.

Medina.—Northern Ohio gives up with reluctance Rev. J. R. Nichols to First Church, Marietta. He has served in his old pastorate with conspicuous success for six years, and the church unanimously refused to accept his resignation. But because of the important interests of Congregationalism in Southern Ohio it yielded later. Mr. Nichols preached his farewell sermon March 14, and received 18 new members, nine on confession. During his fruitful pastorate the church received 228 members, 138 on confession.

Burton.—The pastor, Rev. E. O. Mead, is making special efforts during the Lenten season and the spiritual life is deepening. For three months the interest and attendance at prayer meeting have been gaining, and the attendance at C. E. meetings has recently doubled and 10 new members have been received. The last fiscal year closed with all bills paid and more money was given to missions than ever.

Painesville.—The council called relative to the resignation of Rev. P. W. Sinks passed resolutions appreciative of his work in the pulpit, as pastor and as citizen. His pastorate of over nine years was the longest the church ever had. The Sunday evening service, March 21, was a farewell occasion, Methodists, Baptists and Disciples uniting.

Canfield has in the last two years been well sustained and is a spiritual power in the village. Rev. W. T. McConnell, the pastor, supplements his small salary with the income of a jewelry repair shop, in which he works six days a week.

Shandon.—At a recent communion eight persons were received on confession. The Young People's Society has increased in interest and numbers. The resignation of Rev. Frank Foster goes into effect April 1, after a pastorate of a little over four years.

Chester.—The Congregational, Disciple, Baptist and Free Baptist churches have united in a series of union meetings with good results and additions.

Illinois

Chebanse, Rev. J. H. Simons, pastor, has enjoyed seven weeks of special meetings held by the Methodists nearly six weeks, the Congregationalists uniting with them. Then Evangelist Wyckoff spent a week with the Congregational church. Altogether there were more than 60 conversions. Sixteen have already united with the church.

Chicago.—Ravenswood. Rev. Charles H. Keays, the pastor, died last Monday morning at about six o'clock, after a short illness with malignant typhoid fever. Mr. Keays has been in this pastorate since 1890, and was ordained in 1882. His former pastorates were Oskaloosa, Io., and Grand Haven, Mich.

Elmwood.—Rev. H. F. Sayles has assisted the pastor, Rev. A. Miles, in services continued seven weeks, with large results. The 26 who have already united with the church are mostly men. Meetings at noon in the coal mines resulted in the conversion of the miners.

Huntley has been assisted for two weeks by Evangelist J. D. Wyckoff, with at least 20 conversions.

Indiana

Michigan City.—First has had a quiet interest through the winter. At the March communion nine persons were received to membership on confession, making a total of 104 during the three years' pastorate of Rev. W. C. Gordon. The Young Men's Club of about 50 members has charge of the Sunday evening services and last fall purchased a fine stereopticon. A young people's Bible class has been established recently and the Sunday school is in a flourishing condition.

The Welsh Congregational work in Indiana consists of two recently organized churches, one at Elwood, the other at Gas City. At Elwood there is a good building, erected last year, and a flourishing Sunday school, ministered to by Rev. Richard Powell. At Gas City a church has been organized, but no building has been erected. Rev. M. Hussey is pastor. The attempt has been made to unite the Welsh Baptists and Congregationalists in the church, but the matter is not as yet entirely settled.

Michigan

Detroit.—First. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton has undertaken to conduct the weekly study of the S. S. lessons at the close of the Wednesday evening prayer meeting. Many besides teachers will enjoy these hours of study.

Grand Rapids.—East has just closed a successful series of meetings, Evangelist Joel Martin assisting. The interest has been deep and conversions are resulting. Mr. Martin begins work with Smith Memorial Church shortly.

Hart.—The pastor, with the aid of Rev. E. J. Burgess, recently gave a stereopticon lecture on Olivet College with over 100 views. The church is indebted to the community for its fine equipment of electric lights.

Port Huron.—Ross Memorial. The church and society at a special meeting, March 24, unanimously refused to accept Rev. B. F. Brundage's resignation, and also voted him a period of rest.

Wayland has just dedicated a new modern edifice.

Wisconsin

Madison.—First has recently, by a special effort, raised over $4,000 to pay floating and other indebtedness. It has also during the past year raised about $1,000 for Pilgrim Chapel.

Sparta has been helped by a remarkably successful evangelistic effort, Evangelist A. M. Hills assisting. Dr. William Crawford, the pastor, considers the resulting ingathering the largest single addition which ever occurred in his ministry.

Alderly.—Mr. S. G. Ruegg, the pastor, is encouraged by having more men than women in the regular congregations. The pastor was surprised recently by the donation of the proceeds of a social and supper by the C. E. Society and forwarded a share to the W. H. M. S. as a thank offering.

Platteville.—Mr. R. C. Bennett was recentl ordained. He has been an officer of the church fo over 10 years and has been specially devoted to the varied lines of Christian effort, frequently conducting services for the adjacent mission enterprise and for one of the city churches. For a year pas he has been a licentiate of the Beloit convention ministering to five points in the region of Platteville. He now devotes himself exclusively to the ministry and becomes the pastor of the missio

Visu carentem magna pars veri latet, sai Seneca They that are dim of sight see truth by halves Some purchasers see only price; they are blind to quality Some see only beauty; they are blind to price. Either i bad economy.

We try and build beauty on the foundation of low cost A good example is this Sideboard. Look at the $60 Sideboards in all other furniture stores in this city. Pick th very finest at $60. Then compare it with this at $38.

Glance at the details. Notice the very graceful framing of the base, with its serpentine curves. There are three shelves above the board. The trimmings are of pierced brass. The sides have the fashionable oblong paneling. There is a triple-partitioned lined drawer for small silver.

The wood is a special selection of the lightest grain o White Oak, with a golden finish and high polish. Th price of $38 for such a Sideboard is almost sensational.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK

In the world of trade unfavorable factors have of late rather predominated. The movement of merchandise is disappointing and prices received therefor are not satisfactory. Merchants say that if prices for commodities were a little higher, allowing of a greater margin of profit, there would be less reason to complain.

The apathy of general trade is evidenced by the extremely light supply of mercantile paper on the money market, and note brokers have rarely had so little to do. Reports from nearly all sections indicate that collections continue slow. The supply of funds is very much in excess of the demand and monetary rates have lost none of their easy tendency.

The most important event in the business life of the country during the past ten days has been the Supreme Court decision in the trans-Missouri case. This decision upholds the Sherman anti-trust law and declares pooling and traffic associations by the railroads illegal and in restraint of trade. The decision came as a great surprise and resulted in a pretty severe shakedown in the stock market.

The hope of the railroads is that the case of the Joint Traffic Association will be advanced on the Supreme Court calendar, and that when all the facts are known the trans-Missouri decision will be reversed. In the writer's opinion the interstate commerce law should be amended so as to allow the railroads to pool their freight. It has been fully demonstrated that business interests, the traveling public and investors are better served when the roads maintain rates by traffic associations than when they are engaged in cutting each other's throats in a regular "Kilkenny-cat-fight" scramble for business.

The activity in wool continues and purchases of woolens are large in anticipation of the tariff. Cotton goods show no improvement either in movement or price. Iron and steel are inclined to be sluggish and quoted prices are easier. Copper is also shaded a trifle because of light demand. The outlook for general trade and also for Wall Street speculation is a more or less lengthy dull period, or until the tariff discussions are out of the way.

EDUCATION

—— The Antigone of Sophocles was given by the students of Drury College in Baldwin's Theater, Springfield, Mo., March 19, and so great was the demand for seats that it was repeated the next afternoon. The play was given in English, each player translating his own part. The chorus part was given in Bartholomew's translation and Mendelssohn's composition. The translation by the students was strikingly well done, and the rendering upon the stage was impressive. Drury College is the first institution west of the Mississippi to render the whole of a Greek play, and the event has attracted great attention. Prof. F. A. Hall, at the head of the Greek department, is to be highly commended for the enterprise and thoroughness with which the plan has been carried through.

—— The following statistics are significant. They refer to the year 1895-96, were compiled by Professor Schwat of Yale, and have value not only as comparisons between our two largest universities, but also as evidence concerning the choice of studies under the "elective" system. They record the number of hours of instruction given each week in the various studies, and are derived by multiplying the number of class exercises per week by the number of students taking the exercise:

THE WEST

Missouri

St. Louis.—Compton Hill. A check-room has been provided to accommodate wheelmen.——Union. Rev. S. T. McKinney of the Moody Institute, Chicago, has begun work in this difficult field. A reception was tendered him by the church March 26.——The fellowship committee of Congregational and Christian ministers met March 22 and arranged for a second meeting of ministerial and lay representatives of the two denominations at Central Church April 19. It was suggested that a union theological seminary be established in St. Louis. The idea met with favor and will doubtless be further discussed.

Minnesota

Duluth.—Pilgrim a few months ago cleared its floating indebtedness and is now in excellent financial condition.——Morley is enjoying its new house of worship, but on account of financial conditions has feared that it would lose its present pastor. The people have rallied nobly and are hoping for better times. Rev. W. W. Newell has signified his willingness to preach for the present in Plymouth Church, which is pastorless, caring for both flocks. The removal of many families, with the fact that many of the shops remain closed, has caused Plymouth to abandon preaching services for several months, although keeping up the S. S., C. E. and prayer meeting services.——Mayflower has been pastorless for two or three months and feels the hard times, which have caused many of the manufacturing enterprises to close. It hopes to secure a pastor soon.

Clarissa and Bertha are planning to unite under one pastor and are endeavoring to secure Rev. E. N. Ruddock. Clarissa has built a meeting house during the past year and the Bertha church, long practically extinct, has been revived and is preparing to build.

Fertile.—Mr. A. E. Barnes of the Moody Institute closes his work after two years' service. Hard times have weakened the church. The prospective division of Polk County renders the town a probable county seat, in which case growth will follow.

Brainerd.—First is without a pastor.——Second. Rev. M. B. Bird has been invited to remain another year. The church has progressed during his pastorate and is planning to build a new edifice and to convert the old one into a parsonage.

Pillsbury and Swanville.—The work has greatly revived at Swanville and a subscription has been secured for the pastor's support. There is also a spiritual awakening.

Nebraska

Lincoln.—Temperance day was observed in all the churches March 21. At First Church, in the evening, the Men's Club and the Y. P. S. C. E. united in the interests of temperance and good citizenship. A special musical program was carried out with addresses by two well-known lawyers of the congregation. A temperance symposium at Vine Street attracted an unusually large congregation.

Crawford.—Since Mrs. Caswell's visit last November there has been an active interest in H. M work, and the Homeland Club then organized has been helpful. Though the church membership is small, through self-denial and special effort about $55 have been raised. The pastor, Rev. H. V. Rominger, will preach at an out-station in the vicinity of Crow Butte.

Petersburg.—The house in which the pastor, Rev. Thomas Griffiths, rooms was struck by lightning, and he narrowly escaped death. He received a serious shock, and as soon as he could rouse himself found the clothing in his room on fire. Only his energy and presence of mind availed to save his life.

Holdrege.—During the nearly five years' pastorate of Rev. V. F. Clark, 70 persons have become members and $260 have been paid on the church debt. Mr. Clark has been widely influential in this region, having been clerk of the Republican Valley Association and a trustee of Franklin Academy.

Syracuse has been engaged in a debt-raising campaign. The payments on the parsonage are now nearly completed, and the church expects soon to celebrate its entire deliverance. Rev. E. V. Gardner is pastor. Lincoln Association will meet with this church in May.

Grand Island.—The pastor, Rev. H. M. Evans, has been preparing his people by special sermons and visitations for evangelistic meetings, which are now under way. Later he will be assisted by Rev. J. F. Bacon of Neligh.

David City.—Special evangelistic services, interrupted by the illness of the pastor's wife, will be renewed, Rev. W. A. Schwimley being assisted by Rev. Messrs. W. A. Davies of Linwood and C. J. Sage of Rising City.

North Dakota

Portland.—The revival services conducted by Rev. N. P. McQuarrie have resulted in about 40 conversions. The church has been quickened and the membership will be substantially increased.

South Dakota

Hudson.—Rev. E. W. Jenney has just closed a series of excellent meetings and several of the converts will become members. The church had been working earnestly previous to his coming, nearly every one in the community having been interviewed as to his spiritual life.

Miss E. K. Henry has held four weeks of special meetings at Waubay with good results.——Hetland, which has struggled along without an edifice, is planning to build a $1,000 chapel.——Congregationalists and Methodists are holding union meetings at Elk Point.

PACIFIC COAST

California

Santa Cruz.—The pastor, Rev. J. G. Taylor, addressed the local post of Volunteers of America at its first anniversary. It was a donation party, and the members of the Chinese mission attended in a body and contributed generously. Miss Abbie

BENICIA.—The Helping Hand Society, established by the pastor, Rev. Samuel Weyler, is proving an effective auxiliary to church work. Its interesting discussions on the topics of the day have attracted all classes of people, regardless of denominations. Meetings are held monthly.

FRESNO.—The C. E. Society is raising funds for individual communion cups. After years of financial depression this church is beginning to return money loaned by the C. C. B. S. It has also started a parsonage fund.

BERKELEY.—First recently took its annual collection for home missions, which amounted to nearly $400. On the same day 25 persons were welcomed to fellowship.

Decoto has been presented with a beautiful communion set by the C. E. Society of Fourth Church, San Francisco.——Two lady evangelists, one a talented musician, are holding special services at Grass Valley.——The C. E. Society of Scquel holds prayer meetings at the homes of those too infirm to attend church.

Denominational statistics for 1896 show 209 churches in the State, of which 77 are in Southern California, with a membership of 17,251, being a net gain of 543. The benevolences of 188 churches amounted to $49,502. One hundred and twenty-eight ministers are supplying 155 churches.

Oregon

CLACKAMAS.—Union services of Congregationalists and Methodists, in which the pastors have been assisted by Rev. R. A. Rowley of the S. S. Society, have resulted in a great spiritual refreshing. Twenty-one persons have joined the Congregational church and the Methodists have shared in the harvest. A delightful feature is the union in this work of persons long at enmity.

Washington

PORT ANGELES.—The labors of Evangelist D. H. Reid at this point have been richly blessed, the seven weeks' meetings having resulted in about 80 conversions and 40 accessions to the Congregational church. Many Christians have also been led to a higher plane of life.

COLFAX, out of regard for the straitened condition of the H. M. S., has decided to assume self-support, a difficult step at this time. It has also voted to express its appreciation of the society's fostering care.

PLEASANT PRAIRIE.—An excellent fellowship meeting was held March 22, the subjects considered being The Country Church, Pure and Undefiled Religion and Woman in the Church.

TACOMA.—First. A bicycle club, including both sexes, has been organized for the purpose of holding religious meetings in outlying towns during the summer.

OTHER CHRISTIAN WORK

Rev. Dr. David Gregg, with his wife, formerly of Park Street Church, Boston, sailed for Naples last Saturday. He expects to be absent about six months. He will visit Egypt and Palestine with the party organized by Dr. C. R. Blackall of Philadelphia. The church of which he is pastor, the Lafayette Avenue, Brooklyn, received 103 persons to membership, 73 of them on confession, the Sunday previous to his departure.

BIOGRAPHICAL

REV. HOMER N. DUNNING

Mr. Dunning was born in Brookfield, Ct., in 1827. He graduated at Yale with high honors in 1848, and at the Union Theological Seminary in 1852. His first pastorate, at Gloversville, N. Y., continued nearly thirteen years. He was the first pastor of that church. From 1866 to 1883 he was pastor of the church in South Norwalk, Ct., where he continued to reside till his death last Saturday. He was recognized as a preacher of unusual ability, and supplied pulpits from time to time in Presbyterian churches in New York city and elsewhere, but his later years were mainly employed in literary work. He was a master of Greek, Hebrew and German, and made several translations of works in these languages into English, one of the most noted being a poetical translation of the Book of Job. He wrote extensively for periodical literature. He leaves a widow and two daughters, the elder of whom is the wife of Rev. J. B. Lawrence. He was the sole surviving son of his mother, who is still in good health at the advanced age of ninety-three years.

THE BATTLE GROUND OF BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

Many words are wasted in the discussion of minor matters on which students of the Old Testament differ. The most important questions are not those connected with the exact beginning and ending of documents used in the historical books, nor with the time when these documents were brought together. The question of the nature of inspiration is not the vital question. If we can understand what, in substance, the most advanced critics claim, and what their opponents contend against, we may hope to arrive at some satisfactory conclusions from the evidence which both parties offer to prove their positions. The main contentions are briefly set forth in a private letter from Dr. Behrends, whose statements will command the emphatic assent of many Biblical scholars. We take from this letter the following points.

Authorship and date are subordinate questions. Interpretation is still more unimportant. The historical credibility of the general narrative is the crucial problem, and that is more important than inspiration or any other theological doctrine. I take issue, emphatic and decisive, on these points:

1. That the earliest writer in the Pentateuch belongs to the ninth century B. C. This is demonstrably false. The fourteenth chapter of Genesis alone upsets that theory. No critic knows what to do with that chapter. Ewald confessed that it was pre-Mosaic, and the Tell Amarna tablets indicate its ancient and historical character. Abraham is not a myth. That is critically assured. And that one fact makes havoc of the entire theory that the patriarchal history is legendary. Candid criticism must come more and more to recognize Genesis as historical in its great outlines.

2. That Deuteronomy is the literary product of the seventh century B. C., to be located in the time of Josiah or of Manasseh. That contention I fight tooth and nail.

3. That the Levitical legislation is exilic or post-exilic. That is the citadel of Graf, Reuss, Kuenen and Wellhausen, stoutly antagonized by Delitzsch, Dillman, Kittel, Strack and a host of others. Read what Ewald has to say about the Book of Origins in the first volume of his History of Israel. Ewald's Book of Origins includes the Pentateuch document, and he insists that it belongs to the time of David and simply embodies the ritual legislation of the tabernacle. It is a good thing for the critics that Ewald is dead! He was wild in many of his judgments, as time has proved, but in this contention for an early date of the Pentateuch he was massive and convincing.

These are the points which demand attention. They are the Achilles's heel of the destructive theory. Briggs himself hammered them with vigor only fourteen years ago. And the mischief of the theory is that they make the entire recorded history a lie, so that even Hosea is coolly charged with not knowing what he was talking about. No man objects to the most searching criticism. But a criticism which starts with the assumption that the documents are unhistorical and the product of deliberate invention and forgery is entitled to no other consideration than lightning denunciation.

MRS. EMILY B. W. HILL

Mrs. Hill was the oldest daughter of Capt. Francis and Nancy (Colton) Wheelock. She was born in Sturbridge, July 21, 1816; and in Wilkinsonville, where for nearly sixty years her home has been, she died on the morning of Friday, March 19, at 7 o'clock, aged 80 years and 8 months. She was married to the late Hon. William R. Hill May 21, 1839, and united with the West Congregational Church, Grafton, in 1841, of which church she was a member until the day of her death.

Mrs. Hill during many years of her life was an invalid, and thereby incapacitated for many forms of Christian activity, but in spite of her physical infirmities, and without any fulsome praise, it can be said of her that for the good works and almsdeeds which she did she secured a most enviable place in the affections and esteem of all who knew her. Her soul was full of the spirit of benevolence. In her death the cause of missions and Christian education lost an ardent friend and generous supporter. Deeply interested herself in every good and worthy cause, she sought to stimulate a like interest in the hearts of others. To this fact, and not to her benevolence alone, is due the creation of many a life membership among her friends, both old and young, in our missionary societies, in whose behalf she hoped thereby to gain new friends and supporters. But as of her late lamented husband it was said that "his benefactions were not confined to the more public charities, but were rendered through many a private channel which he himself in his sympathy for the suffering sought out," so, too, could it as truthfully be said of his now deceased widow. Her last act, not long before she died when burdened herself with pain, was to send, in token of her Christian sympathy, a gift to an aged man suffering from a broken limb. She knew the blessedness of giving, she now knows the blessedness of the promised reward and of those loving appreciative words of the Master, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me."

Two children survive her—Miss Caroline W., who through the long period of her mother's invalidism devotedly and unweariedly ministered to her wants, and Mrs. Ellen A., wife of Albert L. Fisher of Fisherville. Also one granddaughter, Mrs. Walter L. Mellen of Worcester, and two great grandchildren.

MORE NEWS ABOUT THE ARMENIAN ORPHANS

I have been informed by Dr. Herrick of Constantinople of a grant of 300 Turkish liras made from The Congregationalist's Orphans' Fund, to be used at our discretion for the care and education of orphans whose fathers were killed in the recent massacres in our Aintab station. This is a most timely and welcome help and will go a long way in keeping alive and saving from Moslem control and contagion many of these wretched outcasts. By the aid of English friends we have been sending a considerable number of widows and orphans to Cyprus to be cared for there, but the government puts so many difficulties in the way of this work, and the numbers to be dealt with are so overwhelmingly large, that we seem shut up to what we can do here on the ground. It is very gratifying to us to see this spontaneous Christian charity so generously striving to make amends for the horrible cold-blooded indifference of Christian nations. My soul cries a woe against the Powers that are permitting and abetting these unspeakable iniquities.

Among the gifts recently received for the relief of the suffering about us is one which has given us peculiar satisfaction. It comes from unknown friends in Holland and is designated to be expended for the support and education of the children of Protestant pastors who have become martyrs for their faith. What a multitude of suffering ones are sending up their thanksgivings and prayers for blessings upon the unknown friends who are willingly becoming partakers with them in the sorrow of these dark days. Surely the true Church of Christ must be more than ever made one in this furnace. Is it indeed the purpose of these events to weld the followers of our Lord into one living fellowship by this costly flux of blood and suffering? Prominent men from several outlying Christian villages have recently been in Aintab on their way to Aleppo to seek protection from the violence of soldiers sent to collect taxes. In these cases the Christians had been stripped of everything but their bare huts, and now repeated and savage demands are being made for taxes, and methods such as are well understood here, but would scarcely be comprehended in England or America, are freely resorted to in pressing these demands; even money given for bread, if known or suspected, is relentlessly extorted from the hands of the poor.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES

Some Juniors of Troy, Vt., were so much in earnest in their work that, on being without a superintendent for a year, they organized and carried on meetings by themselves without help for several months.

For more than two years Green Lake, Wn., has had no preaching service, but the society there has kept up its meetings, and 25 conversions among the young people have followed two weeks of special meetings lately conducted by it.

In the east end of the City of Mexico a C. E. Society was started by one who not long ago was a Roman Catholic liquor seller. When drunk he wounded a policeman and was imprisoned. While in prison he read the New Testament and was converted. On coming out of jail he gave up his liquor business, hung Bible texts around the walls of his store and held a weekly meeting in its rear rooms.

At the fourth annual convention of the Fukien societies, held in Foochow, audiences of 750 and 1,000 gathered in the tent on the grounds of the American Board. Reports were given from six Junior Societies and 28 Young People's. Mr. Ling, the first native Christian Endeavorer in China, presided excellently. There were greetings from other Chinese provinces, from Tasmania and from many missionaries, among them Rev. Charles Hartwell, who gave thanks for such meetings on the spot where the first missionaries to China were stoned.

Evangelistic work in every town of their district was planned by a society in Shaingay, West Africa. The district measures 40 miles by 70, and was divided into 22 sections, each containing from 10 to 40 towns. A consecration meeting was held, at which were read Christ's commands to his disciples on sending them out. Like them the workers went out two by two. One of them, a woman 50 years old, walked more than 50 miles to reach the town assigned her. After the work was done two evenings were devoted to hearing reports, and it appeared that 238 meetings had been held, with an attendance of more than 4,500.

On the occasion of Dr. Clark's visit to Fatehgarh he was greeted with a poem of welcome. The mission church was lavisbly decorated with plants and banners, among the mottoes displayed being "India for Christ" and "For Christ and the Church." Two of the mottoes Dr. Clark obtained for use at the San Francisco convention. There will also be used there the gavel and block studded with silver coins which were presented by the Mussoorie local union. At Allahabad two pleasant C. E. rallies and a workers' conference were held, and at Benares, where there are not yet any societies, there were two meetings in the interests of the cause and a reception for all the missionaries of the station, which was held in the quarters of the London Missionary Society.

"A Professor of Books"—Emerson

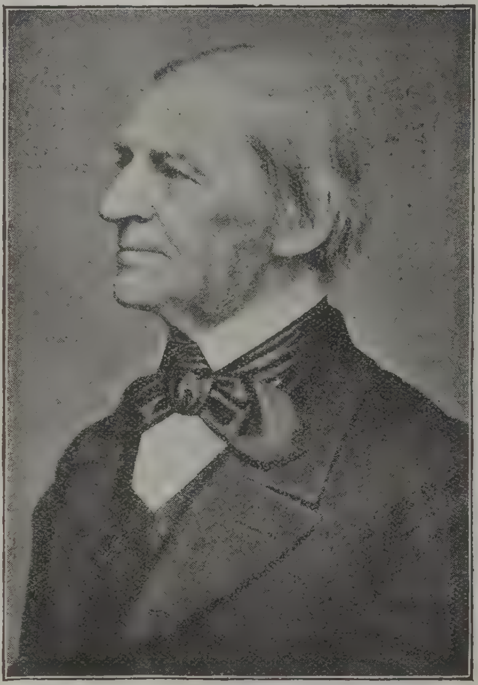
In glancing through one of the early volumes of Charles Dudley Warner's "Library of the World's Best Literature," we met, in the Emerson section, an extract from one of the sage's fine pages that ran in this wise:

"Meantime the colleges, whilst they provide us with libraries, furnish no professor of books; and, I think, no chair is so much wanted."

It is doubtful if any phrase could so happily describe at once the function and the achievement of Mr. Warner in his new and great work. He himself is essentially a "professor of books," although the charm of his work has tended to make us forget his wide and varied learning. And knowing not only books but living writers and critics as well, Mr. Warner has gathered around him as advisers and aids other "professors of books," not men of the Dryasdust school, but those who possess the same salient charm and graphic power as himself.



RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

The result of this remarkable literary movement has been to provide the great reading public, the busy public of ever scant leisure, with just what Emerson declared more than half a century ago we so much needed, namely, a guide to the best reading.

Emerson indeed likens a library of miscellaneous books to a lottery wherein there are a hundred blanks to one prize, and finally exclaims that "some charitable soul, after losing a great deal of time among the false books and alighting upon a few true ones, which made him happy and wise, would do a right act in naming those which have been bridges or ships to carry him safely over dark morasses and barren oceans into the heart of sacred cities into palaces and temples."

Think what is here accomplished. In the case of Emerson himself, the general voice has proclaimed his two volumes of "Essays" a requisite for every library. But if we have the wish to go farther and know more of the work of our greatest man of letters, what volume shall we select? There are ten or eleven others to choose from. Looking into Mr. Warner's Library we find that Dr. Richard Garnett, of the British Museum, a life-long student and biographer of Emerson, has written a critique that gives us exactly what we wish to know.

Again, take the case of the man who occupies in German life the same place as the Sage of Concord in American life. All told, Goethe's writings comprise seventy compact volumes. Emerson himself, in one of those delightful letters he wrote to Carlyle, tells how, after years of effort, "he has succeeded in getting through thirty-five," and despairs of the other half! But who, even among those who call themselves well read, have despatched thirty-five volumes of the great German, or even half or third of thirty-five? Nevertheless, we do not like to remain without at least a general and historical view of Goethe's tremendous activity, and, furthermore, if we go beyond "Faust" or "Wilhelm Meister," we are—the most of us—lost in a sea of conjecture as to which of the remaining sixty eight volumes we shall attack.

How happily has Mr. Warner here come to our relief! He has chosen, to prepare the Goethe section for the Library, no less a scholar than Prof. Edwin Dowden of Dublin, the president of the Goethe Society of England. The assignment was most fitting, as no Englishman since Carlyle is so well versed in all that pertains to the great German, none knows better of his strength and power, none better his shortcomings and his weaknesses. Here we have the distilled essence of his criticism, together with Professor Dowden's choice of what is of paramount and lasting value in the legacy Goethe has left to us.

Professor Evans, of Munich, performs for us a like service with Schiller. Prof. Maurice Francis Egan does the same with Calderon Prof. Charles Eliot Norton, of Harvard, with Dante. Professor Santayana with Cervantes. The historian Lecky with Gibbon. Charlton T. Lewis with Bacon, and so on. Never, it seems to us, was so much talent, such an array of eminent names pressed into service for the production of such compact and pregnant exposition and criticism.

It would be a great mistake, however, to believe that the new Library which Mr. Warner and his associates have prepared has to do with nothing but the "classics." Here, for instance, is Dumas the elder. Who is there who has not fallen a victim to the stirring romances of "The Three Musketeers" and their extensive kin? Many of us, when we have once got into their companionship, hardly know where to stop. But we do not want to be misled into reading an immense number of worthless and mediocre stories that Dumas, in the burst of his fame, was led to palm off as his own, though they were in reality the work of others. There never was a more delightful "professor of books" than Andrew Lang, and we doubt if there is any one living who could tell us so much as he has told us in the Library, of what is interesting and what we wish to know of Dumas.

We cross from the field of romance over into that of poetry, and the first name we chance upon is that of Wordsworth, one of the greatest poets who ever lived—no one questions that. And yet what great poet ever left so much fine wheat mixed with so much chaff! Dr. R. H. Hutton, the editor of the London Spectator, and one of the sanest and most appreciative of living critics, has chosen for this Library the best of Wordsworth's poetry, and has planned such further journeys through the poet's writings as the reader may wish to take.

And so we might go on. But we think we have made clear to the reader that which struck us so forcibly when we looked into the Emerson section, namely, how finely Mr. Warner has, in his Library, succeeded in satisfying the great want which Emerson there so well voiced—that of a "professor of books." Exactly as the professor of chemistry or physics or astronomy or biology gives the student a view of the whole field of his science, the summary of its achievements, its great names and its great works, so Mr. Warner and his associates have given us the distillation not merely of the whole world's literature, in itself a colossal attempt, but, in addition, its history, biography, and criticism as well. It is only when we grasp its full import that we realize the truly vast and monumental character of the Library. It must assuredly rank as one of the most notable achievements of the century.

That there is a widespread desire among all classes to possess these thirty treasure volumes clearly appears from the number and the character of the letters which are coming from far and near to the Harper's Weekly Club, through which a portion of the first edition is being distributed.

Although the first edition is the most desirable because printed from the fresh new plates, the publishers, instead of advancing the price, have actually reduced it nearly half, so as to quickly place a few sets in each community for inspection.

The demand for the most desirable first edition is so active and the number of sets allotted to be distributed is so limited, it is safest for those who really covet this invaluable Library of Mr. Warner's to write at once to Harper's Weekly Club, 91 Fifth Avenue, New York, for sample pages and special prices to members of the Club now forming, and which will close the last day of the present month.

INDICATIONS are plentiful that next week, which is Holy Week, will be observed more widely than ever among churches of our order. We have already received announcements of special services, and not a few churches are planning to celebrate the communion either on Thursday or Friday. We rejoice in this growth of interest in Holy Week. It means that our churches are laying stronger hold upon associations and anniversaries that have again and again quickened and deepened the life of Christians throughout eighteen centuries. Added proof is thus afforded that the person of Jesus is coming more and more to the front of our thought, that every fact and event connected with his humiliation, sufferings and death is precious as enabling us to understand him better and to walk in his footsteps more worthily.

The Second International Council of Congregational churches throughout the world will, it is expected, be held in Boston some time in June or July, 1899. The executive committee appointed at the last National Council met in this city April 2, and arranged some of the preliminaries of this great forthcoming assembly. Considerable correspondence already has been carried on with the English brethren. It is expected that a steamship will be chartered to bring delegates to this country from Great Britain. A committee was chosen to make the first draft of a program. Many subjects of vital importance, not only to the future of our denomination but of the whole Christian world, press for discussion in such a meeting. If weighty deliverances on questions of greatest interest can be secured from representative preachers and teachers of different countries, and free discussion can be assured, this coming council may be as significant as some that are famous in history. The varied surroundings and experiences of Congregationalists in lands having different governments and widely different antecedents have colored the essential beliefs they hold in common and the principles which they apply to church administration. The comparison, by brethren of many lands meeting face to face, of these views with one another, as affected by the changes of the last ten years, ought to be of signal advantage to Congregationalism.

Do not, at the local associations and conferences this spring, scatter attention over too wide a range of topics. Judging from the reports in our news columns we surmise that the best results of these gatherings follow when discussion is limited to two or three topics or in some cases to one topic. Far better is it to take up some large, vital theme, touching Christian living or Christian activity, and consider it in its various phases, than it is to spend a half hour here and twenty minutes there upon a series of wholly unrelated topics, some of which have probably been beaten over so often that it is hard for the most skillful wielder of the flail to thresh out golden grain.

It can hardly be questioned that interest in the Bible has never been so keen and eager as now. The size of congregations drawn to hear competent discussion of the questions now at issue is one proof. A pastor from New York State said in our office last week that the sermons which he has been delivering touching the results of modern criticism have been attended by congregations of from eight to nine hundred persons. The First Church in Amherst has recently pressed into service three of the college professors and the president, who have participated in a series of Sunday evening services on the general theme, The Modern Bible. Its place among other books, its relation to modern science and its fitness as an ethical guide have been the particular phases treated. The conservative and the progressive positions were fairly outlined, and the large audiences, while made aware of the human side of the Bible, were confirmed in their reverence for it as containing God's revelation of himself in redemption. In this vicinity our pastors are finding a response on the part of their people to their efforts in this same general direction. Dr. Barton of Shawmut Church has made his Bible class so attractive as to crowd the room where it is held, and Rev. H. G. Hale, who began at the Leyden, Brookline, last Sunday a series of sermons on the results of Biblical criticism, was gratified by the presence of a considerable number of persons eager to comprehend the drift of criticism and its bearing upon faith. Dr. Herrick's strong sermon, a week ago, an extract from which we shall print next week, is calculated to reassure the timid. This kind of work, if attempted by our pastors, should be done in the interest of faith, and we believe that the constructive spirit is dominating those who are undertaking thus to instruct their people.

Questions concerning the Bible are really questions about what is revealed of God in the Bible. For that reason, chiefly, discussion concerning its origin and history are so intense. For that reason some theologians are suspicious of any treatment of the Bible which does not find, even in its earliest books, a complete revelation of God. But other theologians believe that difficulties in the way of faith in God which present themselves in the Biblical accounts of creation and of the history of man may be solved by regarding these accounts as clews to new and higher discoveries of God. The idea of personality, both divine and human, is vastly broader and higher than it was among men when the Bible was written. The studies and discoveries of the present age have greatly enriched our conceptions of the personality of God and of his relations with men. The wise preacher will not spend much time before his people in analyzing these conceptions or in combating those which he deems mistaken or imperfect. He will rather rejoice in the fact that God is giving a clearer revelation of himself in this age than in any that is past, will strive for a clearer vision of God for himself, and then, feeling the impress of its energy on his own spirit, will so interpret it to others as to make them rejoice in the presence and power of God. That is the best use which can be made of the Bible in the light of the knowledge of today.

THE INHUMANITY OF CHRISTIAN EUROPE

The duty of man to humanity is the dominant theme of Christians today the world over. It represents a kind of higher patriotism which regards the whole human race as one people. It is proclaimed from thousands of pulpits. It pervades literature. It prompts the highest eloquence of lecture platforms and parliamentary halls. Christian England reverberates with it. Sentimental France pleads for it. Pious Germany prays for it. Catholic Austria affirms it. Emancipated Italy shouts for it. Even autocratic Russia struggles within herself at the mention of man's duty to humanity.

No one travels in Turkey with his eyes open without seeing that her government is a curse on mankind. Fears, feuds and fightings make miserable the councils of her rulers. They are bloodsuckers fastened on the people throughout her dominions drawing from each and all the last drop of blood that can be extracted. Turkey skillfully and systematically represses what Christian nations make it their business to nurture in all mankind as manhood. In her cities there are magnificent palaces for her sultans and their favorites. But one looks in vain through her realm for statues of public benefactors. There are no halls where her citizens could gather to discuss policies of government or mutual obligations. Their few newspapers are emasculated by government censors. Not a book in any language can cross her borders without permission of public officers, most of whom are incapable of any intelligent judgment of its contents. Art is scorned. Education is bound. Freedom is a crime. The tax gatherer is omnipotent. Law is a farce. Turkey has prisons instead of public halls for the education of her people. Instruments of torture are the stimulus to their industries.

Everywhere the contrast is striking between the two sides of her boundary lines. Within, barren fields are stripped of trees which have been taxed out of existence. Without are smiling orchards and waving forests. Within, dismal cypresses shroud unkempt Moslem cemeteries. Without, green lawns surround tombs of the dead as though their kindred honored their memory. Within, palaces contrast with miserable dwellings. Without, the lines which divide classes fade into the signs of thrift which mark the prosperity of the people.

Wherever a nation, however small and poor, has escaped from the clutches of this vampire, it has leaped forward to take its place beside Christian nations and to do its part to exalt mankind. In the seventy years since Greece revolted from Turkey, her ruined villages have risen into prosperous cities, and her patriotism commands the admiration of the world. The little island of Samos, delivered from the hateful Turk, has by contrast become a paradise. Bulgaria and Servia have been made new in twenty years of freedom. Yet every one of the little kingdoms which have escaped from Turkey has done so at great cost of blood and treasure, not because the "Sick Man's" grip was so strong, but because Christian Europe supported him against the rights of humanity.

When Turks wash out of existence whole towns and cities with torrents of Christian blood, Christian Europe expresses its horror, and its governments send notes of remonstrance to the Porte. When whole sections of country are devastated and countless crimes are committed, any one of which, occurring within the bounds of a Christian nation in Europe, would bring swift punishment with widespread indignation, the powerless Powers protest to the sultan. Great Britain is especially prolific in protests, and these little notes of her ambassador, Sir Philip Currie, must fill quite a large pigeonhole in the sultan's desk.

But when the little island of Crete, goaded to desperation, rises at last to free itself from Turkish oppression, the six great Powers, representing more than three hundred million people, crowd their warships round the three hundred thousand Cretans, and command them to submit till the Powers shall decide their destiny. When Greece seeks to help her oppressed neighbor, the Powers threaten and bully her. When seven hundred defenseless subjects of the sultan are murdered by his emissaries at Tokat, the British ambassador addresses to him another note of protest. When a little army of Cretans seek to drive their Turkish oppressors from their soil, the great British warship, the Camperdown, sends from a safe distance its hurtling shells into their ranks.

These six Christian Powers fight for inhumanity against humanity, for the oppressor against the oppressed, because they are afraid that if they give their voice for justice to the helpless they will fail to be just to one another. Rather than risk loss to their territory, they beat back the struggles of Christians outside their territory for righteousness and self-government. It is the sorriest spectacle of the nineteenth century. It will stand as a blot on the history of Christian Europe. But most of all will sons of Englishmen in coming generations blush with shame as they read of the bombardment of Cretan troops by British warships. The British ministry may repel indignantly the charge that their government is an ally of Turkey. But the charge will stand as the truth of history.

SPRING FEVER

In our church life we give it another name, but no one doubts its existence or has failed to discover some of its symptoms in his own experience. It is lassitude, indifference, the drying up of spiritual enthusiasm and the tendency to careless drifting. As work grows hard in April days and there arises in the soul a longing to revert to the type of that frugiverous mammal, without aspirations and without the torment of self-consciousness, which man would be if he had not been made immortal in God's image, so a spiritual weariness often asserts itself with the return of spring. The appetite for Bible study declines. It requires a special effort of the will to meet the engagements of religious work and worship. There are even times when the lower nature in us is tempted to suggest the wish "that we might be like the heathen."

These are the symptoms of that spiritual spring fever which often accompanies the lassitude and depression of the physical form of the disease. It is well to recognize them as symptoms, to assure ourselves that we are not mortally afflicted but only momentarily distracted, and, acknowledging that we are mortal like the rest of men, to seek out the remedy. It does not need a doctor of theology to cure the spiritual, any more than it does a doctor of medicine to cure the physical, form of spring fever. A little patience mixed with faith and common sense will do it.

Spiritual lassitude cannot be cured by abstinence from Christian living, but it may by change of Christian work. If we have worked too much like a machine all winter it is time we introduced a little variety into our lives. If our own line of action is for the moment wearisome, it is just the time to devote a little sympathetic study to what some one else is doing. Fault-finding will intensify our trouble, but cheerful recognition of other men's success will enliven us amazingly. Deep breaths of cheerfulness will purify our life, as deep breaths of air quicken the whole life of the body. Paul and Silas had a fair excuse for spiritual discouragement, but they took to curing it by singing hymns.

Spring fever, whether of the body or the soul, is a proof that for the moment the supply of life runs low. For the moment the tide is at ebb and the sands lie bare. But it would be as absurd to say that the remedy for low tide is to let the sea run further out as it is to say that the remedy for discouragement is to have less of the Christian life. A little patience and the tide will flow again. A little cheerful waiting upon God and the joy of work with Christ shall fill our souls and make us wonder why we ever doubted or despaired.

ABOUT SOME NON-CHURCH-GOERS

It is a prevalent notion that in every large town or city a very large proportion of the population holds itself aloof from the churches. Consequently there is frequent exhortation about the duty of trying to win the non-church-goers. There is some foundation for this impression, but not as much as many suppose. The problem involved is somewhat different.

One of the churches in this city recently has made a careful house-to house canvass of a thickly populated region between the Back Bay and the South End, including many apartment houses as well as ordinary dwellings, with the special aim of learning where the inhabitants attend church and how many are non-church goers. More than nine hundred households were visited, not including those as to which for one or another reason the visit proved imperfectly successful, and the desired information was given readily in almost every instance. Out of this number about six hundred claim to have a definite relation to some denomination, and most of the remainder have distinct preferences and declare that they attend some church occasionally at the least. Many among them probably go to church rarely, but, when they go, they generally attend some one place of worship, and in case of need they call upon its minister for sympathy and service. Those who actually stand wholly aloof from the churches are very few.

Undoubtedly many thus inquired of make he most in replying of a loose and casual connection with some religious body. They do not like to be regarded as actually indifferent to spiritual things. Moreover, the respectability of a connection with some congregation probably has a certain weight with them. Too much must not be inferred from their responses. Yet it is safe to conclude that those who stand wholly outside of the churches, and who totally lack interest in them, are by no means so numerous as those whose connection with the churches is slight and comparatively powerless. The same thing is known to be as true of other districts of Boston as of the one just specified. Probably it is the fact elsewhere as well as in this city.

Here, then, is a suggestion worth heeding, or rather a fresh enforcement of a familiar suggestion. Much may be done in the way of increasing the interest of those who now pay only superficial or occasional heed to the churches and their work. Most of them do not include themselves among the "unchurched masses" and dislike being thus described. Any appeal which is made to them upon that supposition repels them instead of obtaining a hearing. But judicious sympathetic methods of approach are likely to succeed. And the task of the churches in winning them, difficult although it is at the best, is not so hard as it often is supposed to be. It has conspicuous elements of hopefulness.

No true or adequate theory in regard to the death of Jesus Christ upon the cross overlooks that as a feature of God's eternal plan for the world. It is impossible for the human mind to grasp the conception of eternity. But we are taught distinctly that God's purpose that the salvation of men should be accomplished by Jesus Christ was neither formed hastily, nor even developed gradually, as the course of the then future human history unfolded itself, so to speak, before his all knowing mind. So far as we can comprehend the facts at all, this divine purpose was present in the divine mind from the beginning.

We can at least understand this truth well enough to perceive something of the solemn earnestness with which the need, the method and the outcome of human salvation eternally have been regarded by our Creator. The death of Christ is the chief event in the history of our race as we look back upon it. It seemed to mean comparatively little when it occurred. Most of the world knew nothing or next to nothing about him until all was over. But its significance has been growing more and more impressive ever since and we cannot say yet that we understand it fully. Probably we never shall grasp the entire meaning of the title, "The Lamb Slain from the Foundation of the World." At any rate, we shall not until we are permitted to draw near to the heavenly throne and to receive divine interpretations and impressions of spiritual truth directly.

But that God should have ordained the sacrifice of Christ thus from the beginning reveals alike the majesty of his character, the profundity of the need of a Redeemer, and the infinite love and mercy of the Son of God, in a most impressive way. We are aware of these facts and they touch our hearts always; but when we think of the plan of God as formed away back before the remotest conceivable past, they acquire new and more impressive significance.

CURRENT HISTORY

The Degeneration of the Senate

Senator Hoar of Massachusetts, in the April Forum, denies that the Senate of the United States, of which he is one of the veteran members, is degenerating. He admits freely that the rules of the Senate should be revised so as to punish absentees and curb the eloquence of those who use debate as a club with which to defeat legislation. But he opposes strenuously the theory that State legislatures have proved unfit depositaries of the power of electing senators and that a recourse to popular elections would give a higher grade of men. He affirms that there is less lobbying, less drunkenness, less use of power for personal or party ends and more hard work in the Senate today than there was fifty years ago, and if the Senate is to be compared with the House as an efficient or inefficient legislative body, or if it is to be judged by its compliance or noncompliance with the intentions of the founders of the republic, Senator Hoar insists that it is no more than fair that it should be judged, not by its conduct or its composition at the time when the judgment is to be expressed, but by a review of a whole century of its history.

Senator Hoar is a public servant whose age, career and political ideals are such that it is not an agreeable task to dissent from him. At the same time he is but mortal, and he has been in the Senate so long that his length of tenure there may prevent him from judging exactly where he and his colleagues stand. Certain it is that there are passages in this Forum article which reveal that Senator Hoar is sadly ignorant of the grade of men who are criticising the Senate today. He sets up a Mugwumpian, Pharisaical dude as the typical critic, and then proceeds to revile the creature of his imagination. But what has Senator Hoar to say to critics like ex-Mayor Hewitt of New York, Albert Shaw of the Review of Reviews, both of whom within a week have affirmed and condemned the Senate's decay? These men are typical of the class with whom the Senate has to reckon. The point which Senator Hoar has not touched is, Do senators secure their seats as legitimately as they used to, and when in them do they legislate for all the people or for the few? The senators may be better mannered, more temperate and less lazy than in ante-bellum days. The point is are they as honest and wide-visioned? A man may have passions and yet be a guardian of the public purse; he may be a boor and yet be a statesman; he may be industrious and yet only an errand-boy for his constituents.

"Dying If Not Dead."

The condition of the Anglo-American arbitration treaty in the Senate is such that the above title is justified. As amended during the past week, under the lead of Senator Hoar of Massachusetts and Foraker of Ohio, the idea of arbitration becomes so attenuated that it can scarcely be dignified with the title of a principle of conduct, and the plan for a permanent tribunal vanishes utterly. Senator Hoar's amendment, which the Senate accepted, reads thus, substantially:

> Any difference which, in the judgment of either Power, materially affects its honor or its domestic or foreign policy shall not be referred to arbitration under this treaty except by special agreement, nor shall any question as to the continuance in force of any treaty which has previously been made. It is further explicitly specified and agreed that all agreements entered into by the contracting parties under this treaty shall be signed by the President of the United States and receive the approval of the Senate by a two-thirds vote before it becomes binding upon either Great Britain or the United States.

This, of course, limits the scope of the treaty to the area originally suggested and always favored by Lord Salisbury. It excludes difficulties growing out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as matters for arbitration, and it ties the hands of the Executive in dealing with foreign diplomats. Senator Foraker's amendment calls for a special tribunal for each case.

No date for a vote on the ratification of the treaty has been set, and it does not seem likely that one will be taken soon. The friends of the treaty are growing apathetic and its enemies hopeful. Of the thirty men who can, and it is said will, defeat the treaty, analysis of the list shows that most of them are from the South and West and many of them men just endowed with authority to decide affairs of state. In fact, veteran members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate say that it is amazing the amount of wisdom respecting treaties and foreign policies which men like Rawlins of Utah, Wilson of Washington and Harris of Kansas have brought to the Senate from their experience in dealing with domestic affairs.

British comment on the attitude of the Senate has become more judicial in temper and is satisfied now with pointing out that we are shattering a noble creation of our own. There are Britons who profoundly regret the impending failure, solely because comity with us would have left Britain freer to play her game in Europe and Africa. There are others of nobler mold who deplore the outcome, because it reveals in us less love of peace than they had credited us with.

The New Tariff

In strict accord with the time schedule outlined by the Republican leaders, the Dingley Tariff Bill passed the House on March 31 in essentially the form in which it came from the Ways and Means Committee, 199 Republicans, five Democrats and one Populist voting for it, and 114 Democrats and seven Populists voting against it. Eighteen Populists and three silver propagandists refrained from voting. The bill carries with it as it goes to the Senate a clause introduced by Mr. Grosvenor of Ohio and sanctioned by the Ways and Means Committee—Mr. Dingley dissenting but not opposing—which says:

> That all articles mentioned in the several schedules of this act which shall be imported into the United States between the first day of April, 1897, and the date of passage of this act, and which were not purchased and directed by the owner to be shipped for import into the United States by any citizen thereof prior to April 1, 1897, shall bear the same duties to be charged upon similar articles in this act, and such duties are hereby made a lien upon such articles.

The points to be noted in connection with the above facts are these. Notwithstanding grave doubts respecting the degree of protection demanded in the bill as a whole, and despite dissent from many of its sections, no Republicans thus minded voted against it. Five Democrats from Texas and Louisiana voted for it because it protected local interests. Most of the Populists declined to commit themselves or their party.

The Senate Finance Committee, Senators Aldrich, Platt of Connecticut, Morrill of Vermont, Allison of Iowa and Wolcott of Colorado, intend to take ample time to digest and revise the measure as it came from the House, where it was treated with scarcely more than the mockery of debate. As reported to the Senate by them the bill bids fair to be free from most of those excesses which have brought it into disrepute with men who foresee disaster to the party and prolonged unsettlement of business conditions if it were to be enacted in the form in which it left the House. Once before the Senate it again will become the football of conflicting sectional and sordid personal interests, and the Republican majority is so small that the bill can only pass by paying the price demanded. As for the "retroactive" or "retrospective" section of the bill, probably it will die in the Senate, and if not there then in the Supreme Court. It was put in the bill of the House to frighten importers, and thus decrease the volume of importations pending the enactment of the law.

Legislation, Good and Bad

Senator Foraker of Ohio has introduced a bill permitting pooling by railways under supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, if it becomes a law, may relieve the railroads of the serious disability which they suffer from the recent Supreme Court decision. Bills calling for the creation of a currency commission, and repealing Mr. Cleveland's recent executive orders extending the area of authority of the Civil Service Law, have been introduced in the House, but if the present intentions of Speaker Reed abide the House has about finished its work for this session, and these bills have no more chance of enactment than the many others that have been introduced. The House is adjourning now three days at a time. On Saturday it sat long enough to agree with the Senate in passing a joint resolution appropriating $25,000 to defray the expense of transporting food to needy residents of famine stricken British India.

The striking success in the lower House of the Massachusetts legislature of the bill which proposes to give to the city of Boston a single legislative chamber makes it almost certain that the Senate will take the same action. If it does, and then the people ratify, the credit for the reform must be given to the Municipal League of Boston, which has patiently educated the public, and to the Merchants' Municipal Committee, which has loyally co-operated with the league, creating sentiment among men who have great influence at the State House. All the while, too, the Common Council by its conduct has been digging its grave.

The summary enactment by the legislature of New Jersey of a law guarding officials and stockholders of corporations organized in New Jersey from statutory liability arising out of the laws of other States is a step showing how wedded that State is to a policy of deriving revenue from corporations, and how zealous it is in protecting those whom other States are trying to tax. The law was enacted to defeat the purpose of laws now passing through the New York legislature. The lower House of this body last week passed, without a dissenting vote, a bill which proposes to tax inherited personal property, so that the State will in some cases receive as high as ten per cent. of the estate given to direct heirs and fifteen per cent. of that given to collateral heirs. If such a law had been in force at the time of Jay Gould's death the State treasury would have been $10,000,000 richer.

Worthy Public Officials

The nomination of Andrew D. White, ex-president of Cornell University, and former United States minister to Germany and then to Russia, as our representative in Berlin, pleases Germany, German-American merchants and all who like to see men of character, culture and experience represent us at foreign capitals. Hon. William F. Draper of Massachusetts, who has been named as minister to Italy, has the means and ability to represent us creditably, and his experience in Congress in the Committee on Foreign Relations will stand him in good stead. The new minister to Japan, Hon. A. E. Buck of Georgia, is a former New England pedagogue and long time Southern Republican politician, but we fear scarcely the man for the place and the hour. The important judicial position of Commissioner of Patents, calling for much ability and character, goes to Hon. Benjamin Butterworth of Ohio. Rev. S. L. Gracey of Massachusetts, formerly United States consul at Foo Chow, China, goes back there. In the State and Treasury Departments the promotions of Mr. Cridler to be third Assistant-Secretary of State and Mr. Howell to be Assistant-Secretary of the Treasury are admirable selections, rewarding deserving men and proving that the Administration intends to prove faithful to civil service reform.

Turkey has declined our request, that she raise the rank of her representative at Washington to that of ambassador, and this precludes our sending ex Secretary of State John W. Foster to Turkey as ambassador, he naturally declining to go as minister. It is still hoped that a way may be found to secure his presence and service in Constantinople, temporarily if not for a full term. An influential delegation, representing the several American missionary organizations and educational institutions at work in the Turkish empire, waited on President McKinley last week to renew their assertion of hope that an able and courageous man would be sent to Constantinople and a self-respecting American policy be formulated at the State Department. Latest reports from Anatolia indicate that our missionaries there are once more in peril of their lives, and need all the protection that the American flag can and should give.

The Discordant Powers

Greece still is open seaward. The threatened blockade has not been ordered, perhaps because the Powers could not agree, perhaps because they knew it meant war between Greece and Turkey and other evils that they could not foresee or forfend. Pressure from royal personages bent on saving King George from the humiliation of defeat or the necessity of abdication, and pressure from money lenders bent on maintaining peace and credit seem to have caused the Powers that were eager a week ago to blockade Greece to cease pressing that as a proper next step. Rather, the idea seems to be gaining, which has been held from the first by many, that it is folly to ask Greece to withdraw her army while Turkish troops remain to slaughter Christians with impunity even under the eyes of Christian troops from Europe and under the guns of the navies of Christendom. For such is the ghastly record of the past week. Nor is that the depth of the infamy. British soldiers have assisted Moslems to loot Christian villages. British shells have been poured into the ranks of Cretan Christians engaged in a gallant assault on Turkish strongholds. In short, the conduct of the representatives of the Powers in Crete has been dastardly.

On the border the Greek and Turkish armies face each other, eager for war. Most of the correspondents assign greater strength of tactical position and better leaders to the Turks. Once war is declared, Greece will plan to do her most aggressive work against Turkey with her navy, but of course this presupposes that the Powers will obey the law of nations and permit her to enjoy the right of dealing with her enemy as she chooses.

There are some reasons now for thinking that Russia is hoping that war will break out. If she has completed arrangements to localize it and confine it to Greece and Turkey, if Servia, Bulgaria and Macedonia have been touched with Russian gold, if Turkey realizes that she must prepare for disintegration, but slowly and under Russian direction, then Russia's persistent aggressive policy against Greece since the conflict opened can be interpreted as consistent with her long cherished aims.

The British Ministry has announced its intention to join with the Powers in blockading the Greek ports if it shall seem necessary, and the Liberals have announced their decision to test the sentiment of the House of Commons on this policy.

NOTES

April 16 will be Fast Day in Connecticut.

Colorado has just abolished capital punishment.

Johannes Brahms, who died in Vienna last week, was one of the greatest composers of music of all time. His erudition was vast and his ideals lofty. Of his varied work his chamber music will live longest probably.

The Congregational Record and New Hampshire Journal has no patience with Senator Gallinger of that State for his attack on a civil service tested by and based on merit. It says of him:

> Senator Gallinger has seen fit to declare that civil service reform is a monumental humbug. If there is such a thing as monumental humbug in public life today, it is closely associated with the statesmanship which has the effrontery to stand before the people and in their alleged interest attack the most beneficent reformatory movement in the public life of our time.

The German Reichstag's vote rescinding the legislation excluding Jesuits from the empire shows how Germany's policy is changing under the young emperor. It still has to be ratified by a higher legislative tribunal before it becomes effective, but it shows how the tide is running. For a picture of the sad degeneration of Germany under William II. Professor Davidson's Forum (April) article is reliable. Naught but barren results in literature, art and religion can follow such an era of crass materialism and militarism as now is to be seen in Germany.

While senators ridicule arbitration as a method for settling international difficulties, diplomats and working men resort to it more and more. Our dispute with Mexico respecting certain claims made by our citizens arrested by Mexican officials in the lower California boundary is to be settled by the Argentine Republic's minister to Spain, acting under authority of a treaty ratified in 1848; and last week President Seth Low of Columbia University settled a dispute between rival trades unions in New York city which threatened to cause a strike of serious proportions.

The floods in the Interior, extending from the Red River headwaters to the delta of the Mississippi, which cover whole counties in some of the Southwestern States and imperil life and property throughout the entire Mississippi Valley, demonstrate the insufficiency of the levee system and appeal loudly for a new method of dealing with the Father of Waters and his feeders. Preservation of the forests at the headwaters will do much to prevent floods, and those Western senators who are clamoring for a rescinding of President Cleveland's order setting apart so much of the Western mountain timber districts will do well to take broad, far-sighted views of their constituents' real interests.

Our Australian correspondent elsewhere refers to a confederation convention to be held about the time of his writing. It adjourned last week, having provided for a two-chambered federal parliament, free trade between the states of the federation, an executive to be appointed by the queen, and a Federal Supreme Court. These are but meager details cabled from Adelaide. Just what has been done and how far the action of the convention is binding remains to be disclosed by later advices. Unquestionably the idea of federation within the British empire grows apace, and Great Britain only has to discriminate in favor of her colonies to bind them even closer to her. Possibly German and American competition will force her to do so some day.

The prohibitory laws of New Hampshire suffered no detriment at the hands of the legislature, which has recently closed its biennial session. As in the past, persistent endeavors were put forth to weaken them, especially by seeking the repeal of the so-called "moiety" clause, which gives the private prosecutor of liquor cases a portion of the fine to reimburse in part for expense of suit. Some temperance men advocated it, deeming it a temptation to some to do it for the gain. If they had carried the day it would have greatly pleased the liquor sellers as the expense of individual prosecution would be likely to deter from undertaking it if it must be borne entirely by the prosecutor. As it was, a good majority saved the clause to the great advantage of the cause of temperance. An attempt to pass a local option license law and as well a law to license pharmacists under stringent conditions also failed. The temper of the legislature made manifest the fact that the people of the State are not yet ready to take any backward step in the cause of temperance. It is to be regretted that a stringent law against selling cigarettes to minors, which passed the House by a large majority, was killed in the Senate.

IN BRIEF

Easter issues are in order and ours will be forthcoming next week, with no less material than usual specially pertaining to this recurrent anniversary. A special article from Rev. Charles Cuthbert Hall, D. D., the newly elected president of Union Theological Seminary, stories by Mrs. Spofford and Charlotte M. Packard, a meditation by Mrs. Sangster and several other contributions will be permeated with the Easter thought. The issue will contain timely articles also upon topics of current interest. Mr. Morris of our staff will describe the Washington of today from the architectural and educational points of view, and we shall print a second article by Dr. Behrends, in which he expresses his mind regarding the responses which have been drawn forth by his article of March 11.

Closer economy and wiser generosity will bring in better times.

Rev. Dr. Charles Ray Palmer, who is supplying the Kensington Church, London, is drawing large congregations. The British Weekly has discovered his "touches of quaint humor."

The Home Missionary changes from a monthly to a quarterly. Many will regret that its visits are to be less frequent, but Congregational Work will do its best to fill the larger place thus made for it.

As beautiful as merited are the tributes to the late Dr. Kincaid in the April Home Missionary, beloved of all who knew him. Mrs. Sangster's poem is fragrant with personal appreciativeness. She has been a neighbor of the Kincaids in Brooklyn for many years.

The $74,000 plus interest which the town of Plymouth and the Pilgrim Society received last week from the estate of the late J. Henry Stickney of Baltimore should enable those charged with responsibility for guarding sacred shrines and relics to put their property in first-class order.

They are talking favorably in Scotland of Rev. James Denney for the vacant chair in the Free Church College. His American friends who heard him lecture at Chicago Seminary in 1894, or who met him elsewhere West and East, would be glad to see such a deserved honor fall to him.

Really, friends in the Universalist churches, even admitting that heathen nations need no gospel of salvation for the next world, only $4,000 a year for foreign missions would seem to indicate that you are about as well satisfied in view of their present condition as you are with your faith in their eternal welfare.

Lovers of Henry Drummond will not be without authoritative interpretations by his friends of his theory of God and human history. Rev. Dr. John Watson (Ian Maclaren) is to contribute an article on him to The North American Review, Rev. Dr. James Stalker will write in The Expositor, and Dr. Robertson Nicoll in The Contemporary Review.

Dr. Buckley of the New York Christian Advocate has been taking a run southward and sharing with the readers of his paper his piquant observations upon men and things at one of the Florida resorts. He heard Dr. E. B. Webb preach and says that the sermon "thrilled the congregation." When Dr. Buckley praises a sermon it must possess both pith and power.

For years the children of the Sunday schools of Brooklyn have paraded on a given spring day. It has degenerated, as many schemes originally wise do; so that this year not a few of the schools are refusing to participate. Among them are the schools of the Tompkins Avenue Church, the teachers and pupils agreeing that to perpetuate the custom would be unwise for them.

Men who have sworn to execute law in Maine have so ignored their oaths that the Christian Civic League has come into being. The Christian Mirror, commenting on the situation, says, "The non-enforcement of the prohibitory law in the State and its baneful influence upon political life in Maine have made the late celebration of the birthday of its author almost farcical."

A trolley line will soon cross the Nile from Cairo to the Pyramids. It will pass by the magnificent new museum now being built not far from the site of the Boulak Museum. There the mummies of the great Rameses II. and other kings who reigned before Moses will lie in state. Would they have wanted their carcasses to be preserved if their prophets had foretold that they would some day be stared at by visitors from an unknown land, arriving in electric cars?

Zion's Herald has the following very interesting item of news:

> A steamboat has been placed on the River Jordan, which makes the journey from Jericho to Tiberias—that is, from the Dead Sea to the Lake of Galilee—in about seven hours.

Jericho is in the Jordan plain, some five miles from the river and considerably farther from the Dead Sea. The distance from the Dead Sea to the Lake of Galilee in a direct line is about sixty-five miles; but the river, because of its windings, according to Baedeker, is three times as long. Between these two points its greatest fall is forty feet to the mile. A steamboat running up that stream at the rate of twenty-eight miles an hour, starting from a landing place five miles from the river, would offer great attractions to the tourist. Can this be a modern miracle?

Another great parliament of religions is announced, to meet in Delhi, India, next year. The Pittsburg Dispatch says that a Hindu editor, who has type representing the printed characters of almost every known tongue in the civilized world, has printed the invitation in various languages and "scattered them broadcast over the face of the earth." This must have been quite a task for our Hindu confrère, but perhaps the circulation of his paper is so large that he only needed to make use of his subscription list to cover the face of the earth. At any rate, according to the Dispatch, the call has been sent to every minister of any prominence in America, and many have replied that they will be there. We wish merely to add, to avoid unnecessary correspondence, that all those going from this vicinity who expect to attend the parliament, so far as we have been advised, have already secured pulpit supplies for the full term of their absence.

Mr. William T. Ellis, associate editor of the Golden Rule for the last two years, leaves Boston next week for Philadelphia, to become assistant editor of the periodicals of the Presbyterian Board of Publication. His new chief is Rev. J. R. Miller, D. D., the well-known writer of excellent devotional literature. Mr. Ellis will have special charge of Forward, the young people's paper published by the Presbyterians. His work on the Golden Rule has told in many departments of that paper and his signature of an article has been sufficient to secure it a reading, while his bright way of putting things has been equally evident in much of the unsigned editorial matter of the paper. When such a man leaves our local circle of religious editors we always have two regrets. The first is due to the fact that because of the steady pressure of daily work we have seen so little of him, and the second is that we have no association which brings the quill drivers of the religious press of Boston together now and then. When shall we unite in consummating what everybody with whom we have conferred heartily favors?

Authors like Mr. Howells and Mr. Charles Dudley Warner, and clergymen like Rev. Dr. D. H. Greer of New York city, stand sponsor for an effort to secure $50,000 as an endowment for the education and support of Helen Keller and her inseparable companion and loyal teacher, Miss Sullivan. Half of the amount already has been raised, and other contributions may be sent to Edward King, Esq., 80 Broadway, New York city. Possessed of the sense of touch only, through it Helen has struggled upward, so that, despite her almost overwhelming disqualifications, she is a student of very unusual promise, speaking English, French and German, writing a good hand and operating a type-writer accurately. Her spiritual powers are such that she may almost be said to have a virgin soul, and Mr. Warner, writing about her not long since, referred to her with reverence because of her comparative impeccability, not hesitating to place her next to Jesus in her revelation of what soul-beauty may be. Surely such a person should be put beyond want or thought of material needs.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE

FROM NEW YORK

City Farming

One of the plans which the friends of the poor have started here and made some progress in—indeed, the most sanguine of them claim that it has grown out of the experimental stage—is that of "vacant lot farming." Sharp-eyed people entering or leaving the city by rail in the spring will see little plots of land along the outskirts laid out into beds of early vegetables, etc., some of which show signs of careful cultivation, promising good crops. On most of these are rough little shanties, the rude home of a "squatter sovereign" and his family, allowed by the owner of the plot to live there, till the soil and sell or consume the crop as a compensation for guarding the property against intruders, fence stealers and loafers generally. Some of these men labor also as porters, doing the heavy work in the owners' stores down town.

Of these lots here and there one is put by benevolent owners at the disposal of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, for use in the enterprise named above. It selects an honest man, poor but willing to work, helps him to secure implements, seeds, fertilizer, etc., instructs him when needed, sets him, his wife and children to work, helps him to sell his produce, keeping him and his from street begging or worse, and so teaching them industry, self-reliance, frugality and self-support. In East Brooklyn and Long Island City the plan is worked on a larger scale. In the last named suburb, through the generosity of the late William Steinway, the society has the use of 140 acres of good land, on which it has employed about that number of families at farm labor. Of course the results are as various as are the characters of the employed, but on the whole they have been such as to encourage the friends of the plan, who see in it one promising method of fitting many of the non-producers here to earn their living by farm work, and gradually getting them away from city temptations to the broad acres of the West.

Medical Inspection of Schools

A new and important step has been taken jointly by our board of education and that of health, for preventing the spread of contagion through the school children and for the better preservation of their health. A corps of 150 competent physicians have been appointed medical inspectors of schools, whose duty it is, in conjunction with the teachers, to keep close watch of the pupils showing signs of imperfect health, and specially of contagious disease, and to promptly take efficient measures for curing them and preventing their spread. A set of properly stringent rules for teachers concerning the matter has been printed, carefully guarding them against unreasonable complaints or want of co operation on the part of parents and family physicians who may be vexed by their required reports to the inspectors, or their summary dismissal from school of pupils with contagious disease or offensive want of cleanliness. The timely wisdom of the new movement appeared from the very first day's inspection, when of 4,255 pupils examined 140 had to be excluded until cured. Among these diseased pupils were found cases of diphtheria, measles, mumps, croup, scarlet fever (one case), contagious eye diseases, chicken pox, various skin diseases and plenty of heads abounding in something besides knowledge. The president of the health board believes that the new movement will go far to stop contagion and will greatly lower the city's death rate.

Brooklyn Progress

The constant complaints, well or ill founded, of delays in the postal traffic between New York and Brooklyn bid fair to cease ere long. Contracts are made with a pneumatic tube company, which has rented from the bridge trustees the privilege of crossing thereon, for the transmission of mail matter between the two post offices in three minutes and a half. The two tubes will have a transmitting power of 200,000 letters an hour each way, the propelling power being compressed air.

Then those wide-awake Brooklynites found out another economic use for compressed air, viz , as a modifier of the coming summer climate. It is claimed to be more efficient, more easily managed and far cheaper than ice. Another company is formed to compress the air, introduce it into storage and refrigerating warehouses in which compartments will be let to those whose goods must be kept at a certain temperature. When so tested the company purposes by laying pipes to introduce the cooling air into stores and private houses, so that families that summer in the city, having delicious coolness "laid on" at will, like their water and gas, may at a trifling expense enjoy the comforts of home along with the refreshing air of the mountains or the seashore, and smile at their fashionable neighbors penned in seven by nine hot summer hotel rooms at the rate of ten dollars a day for each sweltering sufferer.

Personal

Dr. Storrs is taking a well-earned rest from Sunday evening services, and the pulpit of the Church of the Pilgrims has been filled by such preachers as Drs. John Hall, Lyman, McLeod and Hartranft, to be followed by Drs. E. B. Coe and Charles Cuthbert Hall until May 9, when Dr. Storrs will take the pulpit again.

The latest supplies of the Broadway Tabernacle pulpit have been Presidents Stryker of Hamilton College, Raymond of Union, Hartranft of Hartford Seminary, and Dr. W. L. Phillips of New Haven. Clearly the church is not suffering for lack of the very best preaching nor of appreciative audiences, but it needs on all accounts a settled pastor.

Rev. John Brittan Clark, fully recovered from his bicycle accident, has returned from his vacation in southern California, and preached in his Lee Avenue (Brooklyn) pulpit April 4.

Dr. Lyman Abbott addressed the City College students, March 30, on their Selection of a Calling for Life, telling them that the making of money was not the chief end of man, and that what they may do is not so important as is the spirit in which they do it. Dr. H. A. Stimson gave a lecture before the Young Women's Christian Association on What Is Worth While? By invitation of Commander Ballington Booth, Dr. Virgin preached last week before "the Volunteers," thus emphasizing the closer relations of that body to the churches, as distinguished from the Salvation Army. Dr. Virgin's Pilgrim Church now heads in membership the Congregational churches of the city. Of the fourteen churches the membership of twelve, omitting the Welsh and Spanish, is 2,982. Of these the Pilgrims number 764, and the Broadway Tabernacle, since its contribution to the new Manhattan, has on its roll 730.

Dr. George F. Pentecost and family arrived from London by the Mohawk, March 30, and were received by a committee of his new Yonkers charge, before whom he preached his first sermon April 4. His installation is expected to take place on the 30th. HUNTINGTON.

FROM AUSTRALIA

A Federal Stir

Six years ago a convention was held for the purpose of framing a federal constitution for Australasia. The convention fulfilled its office in this respect, that it framed a constitution, but the Draft Bill in which it was embodied never received the assent of the several colonies, and the work of constitution making is—or very shortly will be—once more in hand. The last convention was really a parliamentarians' convention, and quite ahead of public opinion. On the present occasion, to remedy this defect, the members of the convention will be elected by the constituency which votes for the popular house in each colony. Each colony becomes one constituency, and every elector in each colony has to vote for ten men.

Outstanding Colonies

By the time this reaches you the convention will have met and adjourned. Unfortunately, it will not quite represent the Australian concert. It does not pretend to represent the Australasian concert. It seems to be recognized that New Zealand is too far off to participate in federal action, and without her no Australasian movement is complete. Of the colonies on the Australian continent, Queensland and Western Australia are standing out, though it is hoped that they may come in at a later stage. From the mainland Victoria, New South Wales and South Australia go into the convention and "the tight little island" of Tasmania will also send delegates.

Alien Labor

What keeps Queensland out of the convention is probably the fear that united Australia would speedily make a clean sweep of the system of colored labor, upon which the Queensland sugar plantations are worked. The Australian democracy are in earnest about keeping Australia for the white races, and the employment of Kanakas in the Queensland sugar industry is viewed with no favor by the rest of Australia.

A Cardinal as a Candidate

There was a fear among federationists that the federal cause will suffer more from the apathy of the electors than from anything else. This fear is likely to be removed by the announcement of Cardinal Moran as a candidate for a seat in the convention. It has been replaced by a fear that the election may be conducted on the issue of Protestantism versus Catholicism. Towards this undesirable end the Orangemen are helping. The Orange ticket, as a rule, finds little favor with Congregationalists. They hold that no civil disabilities should be imposed on a man because of his religion, and claim that the cardinal, like all other aspirants for office, should be judged solely on the ground of his fitness or unfitness for the post he seeks to occupy.

The Women's Vote in New Zealand

It will be surprising to many to know that the effect of womanhood suffrage in the two colonies which have it—New Zealand and South Australia—has not been to affect materially the position of political parties. The Prohibitionists in New Zealand hoped much from it, but were defeated at last election. The returns came out thus: for licenses to continue, 139,249; to be reduced, 94,226; no licenses, 98,103.

A Socialistic Experiment

Some years ago, at the instigation of socialistic propagandists, some hundreds from different Australian colonies went out to found a "New Australia" in Paraguay. The settlement was speedily rent by internal dissensions, and the last news is that ten married couples who went out from Queensland are applying to the Queensland government to bring them and their forty children back again. Peace and plenty do not result from Australian attempts at socialism.

Australian Notions of American Affairs

No election for the presidency has ever excited such an interest in Australia as that which resulted in the return of Major McKinley. There seems to be a general feeling here that the issue was not really between gold and silver, but between order and anarchy. It is difficult for us at this end of the world to understand the tremendous energy which you have put into the discussion of the silver question. It may appear strange to you, seeing that this is a silver producing country, that the question of bimetallism has really never taken any hold of our people's minds. Now and again an enthusiastic bimetallist has appeared, preaching up his peculiar doctrine, but his words have fallen like fire on ice. The enthusiasts of bimetallism have simply perished of neglect.

CURRENT THOUGHT

AT HOME

Prof. H. H. Swain of the University of Wisconsin, writing in a discriminating manner in the Kingdom on The Department Store, says: "It is true that all changes in the progress of industrial society work hardships to individuals, and it is by no means certain that the public who reap the advantages of the improvement ought not to make good the injury done to those who are displaced. When a community is benefited by the building of a railroad it may well afford to buy out, and even pension for life, a stage driver who cannot compete with the railroad; but to propose that the community forego the advantages of improved communication for year after year, because a stage driver might thereby lose his occupation, would be on a par with the plan to tax department stores out of existence. . . . To tax department stores out of existence would not only destroy the business of many people and increase materially the cost of living to thousands of others, but, on the other hand, it could not give assurance of business success to a single retail dealer."

The Christian Work, which inclines usually to conservative, though not reactionary, views, concludes an editorial on Biblical Criticism thus: "While holding firmly by the Bible as containing God's revelation of himself, let us be careful not to claim for the Book more than it claims for itself. Nor let us condemn such reverent and careful critics as Luther, Dorner, Neander, Hengstenberg, Willis J. Beecher, Dr. William R. Harper and others, some of whom have so grandly helped us, and some of whom are still helping us to a better and clearer understanding of the divine Word. Rather it becomes all students of the Bible to maintain an attitude of perfect fairness, to welcome light from any quarter, while resting sure in the knowledge that as a spiritual guide, as a revelation of God's will to man, the Bible is unassailable."

ABROAD

Prof. A. S. Wilkins, reviewing in The Critical Review Strong's Christian Ethics, says that the whole argument of the book is "that the church should resume its functions of discipline." Professor Wilkins points out that "'discipline' is a meaningless term unless it implies penalties for its infraction. . . . If he means that Christian teachers are to hold up a high standard of duty for Christians as such, quis negabit? If he means that the church has a right and a duty so to control its members as to secure by the infliction of penal measures (such as temporary or complete expulsion) that they shall not live by secular standards, then he is claiming for it a function for which it has neither the officials, or the processes, or the criteria. Conduct flagrantly inconsistent with the Christian profession is a different thing, and of that we are not speaking; but a general lowering of the moral tone, resulting in a falling short of the full demands of the Christian life, can never be dealt with otherwise than by an inspiration of spiritual force, and then no discipline will be needed."

IS IT NOT THE GULF STREAM

BY REV. D. N. BEACH, D. D., MINNEAPOLIS

Dr. Behrends's article, disclaiming ecclesiastical censure, standing for liberty and a voice of loving solicitude rather than of hurtful alarm, will find many responsive hearts. Those even whose point of view is quite different from his will honor him for it. May such an one say how the question which the article raises looks to him?

The newer religious thinking, in its truer exponents, beholds the same God, the same omnipotent Saviour, the same new-creating, life-giving Spirit, the same light-bringing and renovating Scripture, the same sinning, needing race of man, the same mighty redemption, the same church with its divinely appointed means thereto, and the same realities of life, death, the judgment and the world to come, as did the older thinking. The facts alter not. It only sees these facts in larger lights. It feels bound to walk in the light of the ampler knowledge which is now ours, and of that quickened insight which the Spirit gives.

1. Scripture is not less to it. It is more. But Scripture appears not to be ab extra any longer, but an intrinsic thing. God is speaking to every man. He hath not left himself without witness. The same Spirit which opens the reader's mind opened the writer's mind, so that the revelation is a continuous, vital thing, not a book thing. Names do not frighten the new temper, whether French, Dutch, German, Scottish, English or American. The same thing which made Scripture possible, and its response in men's hearts possible, would, according to all analogy, construct Scripture gradually, with much reworking, and vitally rather than wordily; to which inherent probability modern criticism (doubtless most faulty and only tentative as yet) adds its confirmation, as a measureless relief to reason and to one's sense of the general law underlying God's relation to human intelligence.

A parent's self-revelation to his child is never complete or adequate, even when his child is fifty, but still strives to make its meaning completer to the last. How much more the heavenly Parent's! In such a light one lifts the Book and kisses it, and listens to it in its vitality, its naturalness and its divine incompleteness, and yet sufficiency, with quite a new sense of its sacredness and obligation. Its words are hardly words any longer, but spirit and life the rather. There is an eddy about all this, of fear, and even temporary error, as in the disturbed and perilous currents running at Key West, but beyond is the warm, majestic sweep of the Gulf Stream, bringing warmth and life to the newer Bible study and Bible heeding.

2. To the truer representatives of the new temper the Trinity, likewise, is not less but more. In fact, so deeply does its underlying truth appeal to that temper that here is perhaps the most solemn realm in which that temper moves. Witness, for a noble and typical illustration, that doctor of our own Congregational communion each one of whose books strikes a nobler note, Rev. George A. Gordon. From the earliest of his maturer work this great doctrine, as with his revered master, F. D. Maurice, has been primal. As he once said to the Boston ministers, he offends both his Unitarian and Trinitarian friends by his insistence on this truth, with all that it involves in so many directions.

But because the Trinity is so much to the new temper it is very ill content with any grasp of this doctrine yet had, feels that its terminology is bungling and misleading, and would appeal to all earnest souls in whichever camp anew to exploit this great field. Here, too, necessarily, will be Key West eddies, but beyond is the Gulf Stream of a profounder and more living sense of the Triune God.

3 The new temper, moreover, has a no less deep sense of man's lost estate, just in so far as he shuts out God, than had the older thinking; nor a less deep sense of him who is mighty to save; nor of the church, the sacraments, etc., as means of redemption. It has, in fact, a deeper sense, because this whole range of truths has, to the new thinking, passed out into larger ranges.

Man, to its mind, is lost no longer from arbitrary causes, as in the old hamartialogy, but from his constant impulse to separate himself from God—a far more fearful thing—which deepens the lines of anxiety on the thoughtful brow of the newer thinking.

Jesus is mighty to save, likewise, to its thought, in no forensic or ritual way, as with the older soteriology, but in virtue of his vital, present power to lay hold on men's hearts and in virtue of his absoluteness. This is not the "moral influence" theory, as ordinarily apprehended; it is the dynamic, living, omnipotent Jesus theory.

The means of redemption, too, to its conception—church, sacraments and vastly more—have their power no longer as implements, but as the terms in which are expressed intrinsic and living processes in human bosoms, the power of love, of imagination, of feeling, of will and of much besides.

The eddies around these more practical newer conceptions are perhaps the most violent, a sort of Key West and Hell Gate joined, but beyond is the deep sea and the warm bosom of the Atlantic from Hatteras to the Orkneys, bringing to realms otherwise frigid a life as of the tropics.

4. Finally, to the last things the newer religious thinking brings no light mood. Here are the transcendent, untried mysteries. Scripture has awful passages about them. These passages are not more awful than their counterparts in the persistently sinning and unloving life of multitudes of men, and than in our often-felt incapacity for worthy immortality. But these passages are not the only ones on this subject in Scripture, nor is this to which I have alluded a complete and final account of the content of the human heart in this regard. Moreover, there is that humanity which occupied this globe for many thousands of years prior to historic man, through whose anguish historic man became possible.

Also, there is the question of the divine absoluteness and of that justification of itself which it must needs make, not indeed to our limited intelligence and sense of right, but to its own. In the face of these alternatives the new temper fears, indeed, but also solemnly and reverently hopes. Nor does the process lessen a sense of sin and of its awful consequences, but deepens the same, doctrinaire allegations to the contrary notwithstanding. Eddies are here too, veritable Key Wests and Hell Gates (not to pun), but in the two poles of truth here comprehended are the possibilities (already growing actual) of a Gulf Stream for the most frozen Arctic regions of our humanity.

I hesitate to offer these paragraphs in response to the noble but sorrowful tone of the great Brooklyn preacher; but for many a year these themes have occupied me likewise, and, in the room of fear and foreboding, I entertain an inexpressibly tender, profound and living hope, as when

The dawn waketh,
And the shadows flee.

OTHER RESPONSES TO DR. BEHRENDS

SPEAK FOR YOURSELF

What Dr. Behrends says may be true in the latitude of Brooklyn, but we cannot think it is true of our churches as a whole. Virgil makes Æneas say concerning the Greeks, "From one learn all," but we are not willing that even the "Greater New York" shall stand for the whole country in theology. It may be that our brightest thinkers are in Brooklyn, but while these men are speculating between three and four thousand pastors are doing faithful work for the Master in our churches.

Our acquaintance with the churches has been mostly in our villages and smaller cities, and here both pastors and laymen are evangelical in doctrine and would repudiate such statements as Dr. Behrends makes. It is related that when the family of Dr. Lyman Beecher were overturned in a carriage Mrs. Beecher said, "We should be thankful we are not hurt," but the Doctor replied, "Speak for yourself, speak for yourself." So we would say to Dr. Behrends, Speak for yourself and Brooklyn if you will, but do not for our pastors and churches as a whole, which we believe to be as orthodox and faithful as any body of churches in our land. EVARTS.

WHITHER

After perusing one or two of the "responses to Dr. Behrends," undoubtedly representative of the position of a large number of Congregationalists, these questions arise:

For "substance of doctrine," how much would one lose by leaving his accustomed place in an "evangelical Congregational" church and attending the "First Congregational" (Unitarian) church of the same town? As one whose parents were "converted" from the Unitarian belief to the old faith which Congregationalists have long believed was "once delivered to the saints," and who was trained by them in the same faith, but who hopes he has always been ready to accept a better when found and proven, I am compelled to believe that "substance of doctrine" has something to do with the spiritual life. The history of liberalism in New England is not reassuring, I fear, as to the future of Congregationalism if it is to be re-established upon ground so fully occupied historically by those of the Unitarian and other liberal faiths.

Doubtless the pastors referred to would be able to state some particulars of divergence of their theology, as stated in these articles, from that of the historic liberal wing of Congregationalists. But it is to be feared that the layman of ordinary intelligence would fail to discriminate thus.

In the consideration of any question as to endurance of the Congregationalism referred to in these articles must we not inquire whether it has now, and is to have in the future, any distinctive articles of belief in common with other evangelical denominations which shall impart a greater virility than pertains to churches of more liberal and negative doctrines? Was there ever a time when the prayer was more fitting or its necessity more urgent, "Help thou my unbelief"? PILGRIM.

A LAYMAN'S PERPLEXITY

I am not a professing Christian, but am one of those for whose need, in part, churches are organized and preaching maintained, and I think that the older I grow—I am on the shady side of fifty now—and the more preaching I hear, the less I know about the Bible. When I read it at home it seems to me wonderfully clear and plain and precise in its statements. It is expressed in such direct and simple language that it does not appear to need any explanation nor apology. But when I go to church I find by the preaching, which is, I suppose, according to the new and advanced thought, that the Bible is not the book I thought it was, is not the sacred book that my saintly old mother believed it to be when she forbade my reading any other book on the Sabbath.

I learn through modern preachers that the Bible account of the creation of the world in six days is not correct—needs explanation; that the account of the creation of Adam and Eve needs explanation also. Evolution has something to say about that. The fall of Adam and Eve should not be understood as written. Our ministers can't let that go without an explanation or apology that takes all the snap out of it. The story of Jonah and the whale is not literal, but contains a moral lesson which needs to be explained by some wise minister who knows all about whales. Most of the miracles, if not all, must have some explanation or toning down. Even the divinity of Christ himself and his miraculous birth get a new interpretation under the new thought, and the doctrines of atonement, expiation, etc., are so muddled and obscured that the longer I listen to modern preaching the less faith I have in the Bible and the less respect for the preaching.

If the Bible is not to be taken as written, if a man cannot sit down and read it trustingly and with faith, what is it good for to him? Must he get a minister to explain it to him as he would get a lawyer to explain an intricate legal document, and, if so, whom shall he select among Congregational ministers? Where is the "firm foundation" we sing about sometimes in church? Sermons like some of Dr. Abbott's, more than all other influences combined, have unsettled my old-time unquestioning faith in the Bible.

E. A. S.

THE GOSPEL COMPATIBLE WITH THE NEWER THOUGHT

The question as to the direction of movement is most vital with reference to the young men who are entering the ministry. As one who was but recently a student, and deeply interested in watching the thoughts of his fellow-students, I would like to give one answer to Dr. Behrends's question.

That there are movements of thought in our day which compel a new grappling with theological questions none can deny. The doctrine of evolution has become an axiom in scientific classrooms. Historical methods are being applied to every department of investigation. Greatly multiplied materials for a scientific exegesis have been brought into service. A new philosophy and a new psychology have been born. These things are here. That they should compel a readjustment of our theology is not strange. Woe be to the denomination that ignores the problems that they raise. The question is, Are those who are facing these problems men of earnest consecration? Have they had enough experience of the power of the gospel to lead them to make that central?

My experience would lead me to answer, yes. I have seen too much of the intensity of the search after light to doubt that young men in the seminaries are in earnest, and that they hold the gospel of Christ dear. The question is as to how to make its truths vital to themselves and to their hearers who are thinking the new thoughts of the age. Instead of doctrines being evaporated into forms of logic and figures of speech, there never was a time when forms of logic and figures of speech weighed so little. If the doctrines of the Trinity and the atonement have suffered eclipse, it is precisely because men have come to see that in the past they have been too much only forms of logic and figures of speech. The logic must be translated into life, the figures of speech must yield up the truth they embody, or they will be brushed aside as of no present value.

As to Wellhausen and his theory, the case is certainly serious if that theory reduces the Old Testament to "a mass of fables and forgeries." For it is difficult to find an Old Testament specialist in Germany, Holland or Great Britain who does not own some sort of allegiance to Wellhausen. In this country the Old Testament teachers in at least three Congregational seminaries own a like allegiance, while there are men of like mind in Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist seminaries. Every day the theory gains new adherents. But never was the Old Testament so passionately loved, never was it found so inspiring and hence so inspired a book, never did it tell so much of God, never was it so full of Christ as to those who have learned to look at it with the aid of Wellhausen and his theory. That that theory reduces the Old Testament to "a mass of fables and forgeries" no loyal Wellhausenian would for a moment admit.

Brethren, don't raise the cry, "Back to Westminster." Westminster is Calvinism, pure and simple. Was not that matter settled when the Boston council refused on Burial Hill longer to call the Congregational churches of this country Calvinistic? Dr. Behrends misinterprets the movements he discovers. No creed can live in its letter. Each period of intellectual ferment must reinterpret the truth of Christianity in its own terms and by its own methods of thought. Let us be thankful that Congregationalism does move with the flood, and is not caught in an eternally revolving eddy.

Emporia, Kan. W. H. WALKER.

ANOTHER WESTERN OPINION

I am sure I speak for hundreds of pastors in all this region when I say that there is no cause whatever for such a note of alarm. We have the highest respect for Dr. Behrends's ability and judgment, but are sure that he cannot put his finger definitely on his men, with possibly the rarest exception, in the Mississippi Valley. Inspiration, atonement, incarnation, the fall and the other doctrines of which he speaks are all more vitally believed not "as figures of speech" than ever before by all the younger men in the Congregational ministry of my acquaintance.

Plague-Stricken Bombay

By Rev. J. E. Abbott

How the plague, or the bubonic fever, as it is more specifically called, came to Bombay, and from whence, is a mystery. It began in a section of the city called Mandvi in August last, though it was not until the middle of September that it was officially recognized as an enemy to be fought with the weapons of science. Our municipal government was rather slow in moving, but at last commenced to act under a fire of conflicting advice and criticism. Some advisers said it was a filth disease, due to the bad drainage, the unsanitary habits of the people and the crowded, ill-ventilated houses. Another theory was that it was connected with grain, as Mandvi is the chief center of the grain business, and grain is stored in large quantities in the basement and lower floors of the houses. Dead rats were found in great numbers, seemingly proving that the grain was tainted. The grain theory was, however, soon disproved, and the poor rats, ants and bugs were charged with the crime of spreading the plague; but the rats have succeeded in proving their innocency—they, like men, are not the cause but the victims of the plague, working through causes as yet unknown.

Five months have passed and medical men are still in the dark as to its true cause and its method of spreading. In the midst of such conflicting theories our civic fathers had to gird up their loins to do something, for an indignant public was behind them with a sharp broomstick. That we are not as clean as we ought to be was evident to eye and nose, and so the cleaning process began and has continued up to the present moment with ever increasing intensity. The cry of segregation was raised. Our civic fathers determined to be brave, necessary authority was speedily obtained from government, and then began a reign of terror in Bombay. Those attacked at this time were Jains and high caste Hindus. A case of plague being suspected, in came the medical officer, the low caste policeman and the army of sweepers, the lowest in the social scale. The sick were forcibly removed to the infectious hospital, the infected clothes were burnt, the rooms limewashed and disinfected.

These sanitary measures trampled on every social and religious instinct of the high caste Hindu. Their houses were defiled by the cleaning process, their sick friends turned over to the tender mercies of strangers, and altogether it was more than the Hindu could bear. It immediately led to the secreting of plague cases and violent opposition to the authorities who came to carry off their sick. To add to the terror that this activity of the municipality, in the name of science, began to cause, the blacklegs of the city saw their good opportunity. Donning the uniform of some municipal servant, they began in open daylight to seize people on the street, charge them with having the plague, and forcibly pretend to take them to the plague hospital until they purchased their relief by the gift of money. The most absurd rumors also spread abroad, such as that her Majesty the Queen was angry at the recent defacement of her statue, and had ordered five hundred men to be cut open and their livers sent to England. Some who had seen the buboes of patients lanced at the hospital became eyewitnesses to the fact that the doctors were cutting out their livers. The great exodus that began at this time was due, among the ignorant people, not to the fear of the plague, but of the mysterious energies of the municipal officers and the doings of the blacklegs, who were confounded with them. The law soon dealt severely and summarily with the blacklegs; the municipality withdrew their order for segregation, allowed the sick to be cared for in their own homes, and contented themselves with limewashing and disinfecting in the cases of deaths reported to them.

This weak method proved fine soil for the plague to grow in, and, instead of being confined to the locality where it originated, it began to spread far and wide. In houses where it got a foothold whole families began to be swept away, and the exodus of people now fleeing from the terror of the plague crowded trains and steamers to their utmost capacity. Store after store closed; all who could obtain leave left for the country, until finally in panic workmen of all sorts deserted their employers, and today, with half the city gone away, the streets are deserted and business almost hopelessly paralyzed. It is true we have never looked so clean as we do today; limewash has been used unstintingly, until we look like rows of whited sepulchers. The smell of carbolic powder and sulphur fumes fill the air—healthful they may be, but suggestive of many horrors. Feeling that the hands of the municipality needed strengthening, the government of Bombay has stepped in in the last three weeks and has increased the stringency of sanitary measures. More hospitals have been opened and better equipped for the cure of patients. Some of the best experts are here investigating and advising. Professor Haffkine, the well known bacteriologist, is inoculating against the plague, and Professor Yersin is soon expected with his anti-toxine, so that, while the plague is still raging with terrible activity, we seem to be doing what we can to subdue our foe with all that energy, science and money can do.

Daily record of the number of plague cases and deaths is reported in the daily papers, but these figures are unreliable. The secreted cases are believed to be many. The deaths from the plague are, therefore, better ascertained from the total number of deaths from all causes. By subtracting the average number of deaths for the past five years for any particular week from the total number of deaths from all causes for that week, the remainder represents the probable number of deaths from plague. For example, the usual number of deaths per week is about 500. Now the total is about 1,700. It has been as high as 1,900. At its highest point, therefore, we have had as many as 200 deaths from plague each day. At present the total is about 140, with a downward tendency, a hopeful sign that as the warm weather approaches it will be greatly reduced or disappear. Red rings are painted on the houses where deaths occur. Tenement houses with from one to fifteen rings are to be counted as one casually passes through the streets. The total estimated number of deaths from plague is about 16,000 from August last.

The Hindus, being the most numerous, have suffered the most, especially the low castes, who live in crowded and ill-ventilated houses. But the plague has attacked the rich and well-to-do as well. Mohammedans and Parsees have also been great sufferers. Europeans have been comparatively free from it, and of these the pure born have been exceptionally free. Native Christians have suffered much, but it should be noted that this applies only to Roman Catholics. They include the Portuguese from Goa and the descendants of the forced converts to Christianity, who do not conform to sanitary laws. Of Protestant native Christians only eight have died of the plague. Of these five belonged to the Church of England, one to the Methodists and two to the Free Church of Scotland. The above is worth noting, as government statistics make no distinction between the Roman Catholics and Protestants. A distinction, however, ought to be made, for the habits of life of the two vary in many important particulars.

As to the moral effect of the plague, it is ascribed by Hindus and Mohammedans to the judgment of God for the prevailing irreligion and sin. When the sins are specified they are such as neglect of ceremonies and the like, rather than the breaking of God's moral law, but that God is angry is almost the universal expression. Prayers, sacrifices and other propitiatory rites have been offered by the different communities, in the hope that God, or the gods, will be appeased and be pleased to remove the plague. On our Christians it has had a sobering but healthful effect. Many without neglecting their duty have been able to leave the city and put their families out of danger.

Those who have had to stay have had to face the possibility of attack at any time and probable death. Neighbors on all sides have died—in the case of one family fifteen on one side of them, four on the other. The fact that the angel of death thus passed them by has filled their hearts with a new sense of God's mercy, and this has in many cases quickened their spiritual lives. To the honor of the Protestant Indian Christians it ought to be told that though Hindus, Mohammedans and others have deserted their posts, I have yet to learn of a single one of these Christians who has run away from his bounden duty. They have faced death manfully, and who shall say that God has not rewarded their faithfulness by the security of their lives?

What is before us only God knows. We look with concern on the coming back of those who have fled from the city, driven back by the famine. But we know that the God who rules is a God of love as well as judgment. We hear each day of heart-rending scenes, we talk of but little else, as the sadness of the times fills every one to overflowing. The deserted streets, the funeral dirge, the red rings on the houses, signs of death, the smell of disinfectants, the fumes of sulphur, remind us at every step that death is amongst us. But Christian hearts are not disturbed with fear, for the living God, in whose hands we are, is kind and loving beyond all our conception, and faith in him enables us to translate the apparent evil into what must be for good.

That Christians over the world are praying for us we know, and the sympathy of many has opened their purse-strings to help those whom the plague may leave needy and hungry, and the prayers of God's people seem like a protecting wall around us, but it is not for ourselves that we have much concern. We would that the providence of God now manifested in India by famine and pestilence may result in helping this people to come nearer to God and know him better in the love he has manifested through his redeeming grace.

Bombay, India, February.

A man charged with drunkenness in the Jefferson Market Court of New York city recently justified his act by declaring that he obeyed the teachings of the Bible. Being challenged by the magistrate to prove his assertion, he was handed a copy of the Scriptures, and read aloud Prov. 31: 6, 7. He was promptly discharged. But if the judge had been more familiar with the authority on which he based judgment, he might have found abundant warrant for committing his prisoner by quoting Prov. 20: 1 and 23: 32. This judge, however, is not the only man who has based his creed on isolated passages of Scripture selected with interested motives.

In and About Chicago

The Moody Meetings

Probably there is not another man living for whose coming to Chicago all the ministers of the city would strive to make special preparation. Yet this has been done heartily, even enthusiastically. It was done because everybody here believes in Mr. Moody, in his sincerity, in the earnestness of his purpose and in his ability to do good to those who hear him. Even his presence in the city stimulates to greater activity in Christian service many who do not hear him. Sunday sermons and prayers made reference to Mr. Moody's coming. Monday morning the ministers in their various gatherings spoke of it and prayed over it. Congregationalists gave up the whole morning hour to a consideration of what we are to expect from these meetings and of the way in which we can most certainly secure a blessing from them.

Tuesday morning, long before the hour for Mr. Moody's arrival, the Auditorium was packed with an eager, yet reverent, mass of humanity. Thousands vainly strove to gain entrance. So it has been each morning and each afternoon. Mr. Moody must have spoken to as many as 12,000 persons each day. If his aim was to reach Christian people and arouse them he has succeeded. From the members of our churches, irrespective of denomination, he has received a royal welcome. All are disappointed that his stay here has been so short. But he does not feel that his physical strength is equal to a protracted campaign, and his hope is that the work, now well begun, will go forward under other leaders and in the different churches without interruption. He will not be wholly disappointed, although the results will be less than he anticipates. There is but one Moody, and it is useless to attempt any transfer of his power to any other leader.

Death of Rev. Charles H. Keays

The ministers were shocked to hear as they gathered Monday morning that only a few hours earlier Rev. Mr. Keays of Ravenswood had entered into his everlasting rest. Few of them knew that he had been ill. He was robust in his appearance and while a hard worker was always careful of his health. Two weeks ago he had a slight attack of pneumonia, which developed into typhoid fever of a malignant type in which the brain and nervous system were especially affected. Mr. Keays became pastor at Ravenswood in 1890. He was a brilliant writer and speaker and was greatly beloved by his congregation. Very modest and shrinking, he took little part in ministerial gatherings, but was universally esteemed for his ability and devotion to his church. He was born in Ontario, Can., March 8, 1858. He leaves a wife and three little boys, the eldest only thirteen years of age. He was educated at Magill College, Montreal, and in the theological school connected with it. He had pastorates in Michigan at Oxford and Grand Haven, in Iowa at Oskaloosa, whence he was called to Ravenswood. While he excelled as a sermonizer he did not neglect his pastoral work. He was a fine organizer. While reckoned among the more liberal of our ministers, he was thoroughly evangelical and was especially happy in the thought that after years of preparation he was about to see large numbers in his parish converted. The funeral was on Tuesday. Rev. J. B. Silcox of the Leavitt Street Church, a long time friend, made the chief address. The body was taken to Hamilton, Ontario, for burial, where Mrs. Keays will permanently reside.

The Young Woman's Christian Association

This association has just observed its second anniversary. The public gathering took place March 28 in the Fourth Presbyterian Church. The address was given by Miss E. K. Price on the work which the association has already accomplished. She never fails to impart a great deal of her own enthusiasm to her audience. The association is out of debt, and has increased in numbers in two years from 66 to 700. It has a library of 500 volumes, the current periodicals, well furnished parlors and a good gymnasium. It has made arrangements to furnish instruction in music, modern languages, Latin, elocution, stenography, dressmaking, cooking and physical culture. There are lectures on various topics at least once every week. Mrs. N. H. Blatchford is the efficient president.

Birthday of a War Nurse

To residents in Chicago "Aunt Lizzie," Mrs. Eliza Aiken, for thirty years the missionary of the Second Baptist Church, has been a familiar figure. Into how many homes she has carried the light of the gospel, and into how many hearts she has brought the peace that follows a sincere faith in the Saviour! But the years have not tarried for her any more than for others. A few evenings ago her friends to the number of 2,500 gathered in the audience-room of the church she had so faithfully served to celebrate her eightieth birthday. The room was decorated with flowers, muskets and flags as a reminder of her work during the war as a nurse. Few were permitted to speak with her or to take her hand, for she is in feeble health and the public exercises were somewhat extended. They consisted of music, prayer and addresses. Dr. E. P. Goodwin, whose parish covers almost the same territory as that of the Second Church, brought a neighbor's congratulations. The Baptist Boys' Brigade of the church furnished the guard of honor. At the close of the festivities Mrs. Aiken was able to utter a few words of affectionate greeting and to express her thanks for the present she received. The demonstration in her honor was such as is accorded to few women in any walk of life.

A Singular Arrest

While Rev. Paul Nelson, pastor of the Danish-Lutheran Church on Dearborn Street, was visiting in his parish, a couple of zealous policemen set upon him, arrested him and carried him, in spite of his protests, to the station, where, refusing to consider any of his statements, or to permit him to send for any of his friends, or to go to his home, of which he gave the number, they kept him all night. They said that he was a "clever crook" and should not escape them. Through the aid of Tribune reporters his friends were made acquainted with his situation, and on their appealing to the inspector of the district he was released and the representatives of the law sternly rebuked. As Mr. Nelson refuses to prosecute, nothing will be done in the matter, although a good many men who labor among the poor in neglected quarters of the city would feel safer if they knew that such men as these were not allowed to remain on the police force. The inspector compelled them to apologize to Mr. Nelson.

The Humphrey Bill

This bill has been delayed by the parties having it in charge till after the election for mayor and alderman has taken place. As will be remembered, this bill proposes to put the control of our streets, so far as their use for street car purposes is concerned, into the hands of commissioners appointed by the governor, and to this extent deprive us of the privilege of home rule. It need hardly be said that the city is in arms against the measure. If the bill passes, the street car magnates will have the control of our streets for half a century at a merely nominal rate, and at a cost to us, therefore, of many millions of dollars. Those who know the situation prefer to trust our common council, corrupt as it often is, rather than the method now proposed. It would seem as if there ought to be some way to prevent the legislatures of the States from robbing the cities of their natural rights.

The University Convocation

The exercises were held April 1 in the Auditorium. The room was full, although it had been crowded twice before during the day to hear Mr. Moody. Lady Aberdeen was the star of the occasion. Her address was unpretentious and sensible. She recognized fully the advantages of university training, expressed her belief that there is no danger that women will be injured by making use of them, but at the same time asked if the best use of them had been made. She believes that the present is in some sense the age of woman, but she would not have women discharge duties without recognizing their relation to men, or discharge them in such a way as to relieve men of their obligations. She spoke as one who has never enjoyed the advantages of a university training and therefore as one who, while prizing them highly, is yet able to look upon them from the outside and without prejudice.

President Harper made no announcements of large gifts to the university during the last quarter. The annual expenses of the institution are now $703,215. The number of students for the quarter just closed was 1,131. The average increase year by year thus far has been 15½ per cent. So far as possible the government of the university has been put into the hands of the students. A high sense of honor among them is cultivated. Valuable prizes are offered for excellence in debate and increased attention is to be given to excellence in composition and elocution. The university believes that its faculty should determine to what extent its students shall devote themselves to athletics. It will be independent in this respect and will not allow itself to be governed by any outside dictation. Regular courses of instruction have been given Sunday mornings both in the Old and in the New Testaments. The president has himself given the course in the Old Testament. Students are allowed a small credit for regular attendance. The experiment has worked so well that it will be continued. In all respects the university is prosperous. The four biological buildings will soon be finished. University extension, if less successful than had been hoped, has made reasonable progress.

George E. Hooker, once in our active pastorate but now serving society and Christ by study and life at the Hull House, Chicago, has an excellent article on the problem of street cleaning in the April Review of Reviews. He pleads for the abolition of the contract system with all the frauds on the taxpayer and wage-earner which it fosters, and points to results in Toronto and New York as proof of the superiority of the system which makes the city a direct employer, gives to the street cleaner a fixed living wage, and establishes ethical relations which are defensible.

Just why the Presbyterians gather for their assembly at Warsaw, Ind., is understood, probably, only by those who have an esoteric knowledge of the motives which guide the governing body of that church in its choice of places. We presume that the Indiana city will prove a satisfactory gathering place and inasmuch as no heresy trials are to constitute an enlivening feature of the gathering we take it that a presumably ultra conservative theological environment will not prove a make weight in discussion. It may prove an advantageous point for the organization of excursions to the Mammoth Cave and to the region devastated by the Mississippi floods. The date of convening is May 20, 1897, and the sermon is to be preached by last year's moderator, Dr. Withrow.

The Home

THE QUEST OF THE ARBUTUS

For days the drench of noiseless rains,
Then sunshine on the vacant plains,
And April with her blind desire
A vagrant in my veins.

Because the tardy gods grew kind,
Unrest and care were left behind;
I took a day and found the world
Was fashioned to my mind.

The swelling sap that thrilled the wood
Was cousin to my eager blood.
I caught the stir of waking roots
And knew that life was good.

But something in the odors fleet,
And in the sap's suggestion sweet,
Was lacking—one thing everywhere
To make the spring complete.

At length, within a leafy nest,
Where spring's persuasion pleaded best,
I found a pale, reluctant flower,
The purpose of my quest.

And then the world's expectancy
Grew clear. I knew its need to be
Not this dear flower, but one dear hand
To pluck the flower with me.

—Charles G. D. Roberts.

The providential meeting between Dr. Grenfell, the Christian physician in her Majesty's service, and little Pomiuk, the suffering Eskimo child, is paralleled in the dramatic interview between the Chinese viceroy and his youthful countrywoman, as described by Miss Butler. The young lady, only eighteen, is a third generation Christian, her grandfather having been a convert, and therefore her feet are not bound, although she belongs to a social circle where the girls can wear shoes only two and a half inches long. Her simple faith is reflected in the naïve and idiomatic admission, concerning her meeting with Li Hung Chang, that she "understands how God has the arrangement made before already." What a commentary on the breaking down of conservative social customs in the Middle Kingdom that this young lady should be chosen to represent her nation at the Council of Representative Women to be held in London in 1898!

Let no one fail to read Mrs. Cook's earnest words on Fashionable Gambling. The fact that a test case of "progressive whist" in Waltham was submitted to the courts and the judge, himself a card-player, decided that prize whist is gambling settles the legality of this form of amusement. But it has also its ethical side, which appeals especially to Christian women. Horace Bushnell's famous phrase, "The expulsive power of a new affection," applies to things secular as well as things sacred. "I the Lord thy God am a jealous God" is as true at the edge of the twentieth century as when thundered from the summit of Sinai in the early history of the human race. These brief years of earthly existence are a sacred trust and for the use or misuse of time we must give account. Amusements innocent in themselves, if they steal away our hearts and minds from our Master and his claims upon our service, become a snare of the adversary. Even when there are no prizes in whist-playing a familiarity with gambling methods is often a bond of union between respectable young people and the professional gambler, or at least with those whose company is a dangerous temptation to the inexperienced.

FASHIONABLE GAMBLING

BY MRS. JOSEPH COOK

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, as leaders in a much needed reform, have once more earned the thanks of those conservative Christians who have viewed with alarm that menace to deep spiritual life and interest in things which pertain to Christ's kingdom in the modern rage, not only for card-playing, but playing for prizes, which the women of the Temperance Union denounce as "fashionable gambling." There was protest even in the ranks of the Union, on the ground that "many Christian women thought it no harm to have card-playing as an evening amusement in their own homes," and that there were mutterings of discontent is evinced by animated discussions after the meeting broke up and the remark that "before long the W. C. T. U. would try to set the hour of retiring at night and rising in the morning."

These criticisms show how widespread is the evil and how deep a hold it has on Christian women. No one can visit various cities and towns to meet the women of the churches in the interest of missions, as it has been my fortune to do to some extent, without hearing of the absorption of many Christian women in card-playing, and this, not simply as an "evening amusement in their own homes," but good, honest daylight hours are squandered in this way. No wonder that only one-sixth of the women of the Congregational churches are interested in missions and that five-sixths are utterly indifferent and affirm unblushingly that "they haven't the slightest interest in missions."

In view of the importance and immensity of the work there is to be done for the salvation of our own country, and for millions of our contemporaries who have never heard of Christ, it seems incredible that there is this ever-increasing host of Christian women who feel at liberty to waste their time in what our Puritan forefathers would call "vain recreation."

I think it was Catherine Beecher who said that she was going to postpone card-playing until she got to heaven! If it really would add greatly to her happiness she could take it up in that world, but in this she thought she could use her time to better advantage.

It requires not a little moral courage and strength of character for a young woman to set her face and use her influence against such a popular idol of the hour. You can spell it either way you please—idol or idle. But have Christians in this most favored land become so pleasure-loving and self-indulgent that they cannot do as much as this for His sake? There may be a certain amount of social scorn and even ostracism, but the sense of making some sacrifice for the Master will give a deep and sweet serenity of spirit undreamed of before.

And how do Christian mothers dare to engage in such a questionable amusement with any expectation of keeping their sons away from the gambling tables? Only yesterday I heard the story of a mother remonstrating with her son, who had been winning money at poker. His only reply was to point significantly to a pair of vases on the mantel and say, "Mother, how were those vases obtained?"

"O," said the mother, somewhat embarrassed, "those were prizes I won at whist."

"Very well," said the son. "You play for prizes. I play for money. The principle is the same."

It is needless to add that the mother decided then and there to quit her "fashionable gambling." May this latest crusade of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union receive a hearty and outspoken "God-speed" all along the line!

PARABLES IN PICTURES

IV. THE UNJUST STEWARD

BY ESTELLE M. HURLL

Again we turn the pages of our old illuminated missal until we pause at length upon one of unusual beauty, at the service for the "Eighth Sunday after Pentecost." The introit—or opening anthem—is from the Forty-eighth Psalm, beginning at the ninth verse. It is a little difficult at first to identify the quaint Latin text with the familiar words, "We have thought of thy loving kindness, O God, in the midst of thy temple." After some study we make it out: Suscepimus Deus misericordiam tuam in medio templo.

These few words are spread out into four lines, with the accompanying score written in the queer musical notation of mediæval ages. These are inclosed in an arabesque scroll of the most fanciful design. Every curve contains some entirely unique conceit. A tiny caterpillar crawls on the first leaf at the top and a sturdy frog brings up the rear at the end of the scroll. Curious birds with swan-like necks and long, pointed beaks appear here and there, no two alike. Finally a splendid winged dragon stretches his length across the bottom of the page, his scaly neck encircled by the arm of a naked baby figure standing beside him. A border of delicate, starry flowers finishes the whole.

The initial in the upper corner encircles a tiny illustration of the parable of the unjust steward. If the letter bears but a faint resemblance to an S, we have to remember that Liberale shaped it to admit his miniature! The subject was chosen from the lesson of the day, which is found in Luke 16. As an art subject the parable of the unjust steward is seldom treated. The only other instance I happen to know of is a picture in the Berlin Gallery by Schiavone, companion to a picture of the Laborers in the Vineyard. Being long and narrow, it is supposed that the two once formed the sides of a cassone or chest. It was probably a money chest because both parables refer to the payment of money. It is a curious coincidence that the two parables thus classed together in art are also classed together by exegetists as the most obscure in our Lord's teaching. In the picture before us we have no suggestion of a higher meaning—it is simply a deftly painted scene of a steward's office.

The workmanship is so exquisite that we linger with delight over the tiny details—the jars and pitchers seen in the outer room, the pen which the steward hands to one of the debtors. The attitudes and gestures are very expressive, the grouping admirably done. Altogether we have in this finger-nail sketch a story as completely and beautifully painted as if on a great canvas.

A REMARKABLE MEETING WITH LI HUNG CHANG

BY CLEMENTINA BUTLER

The father of the young lady mentioned in this sketch has the distinction of being the first Christian Chinaman to take the first and second degrees in the national competitive examinations. It is the custom, on the attainment of this degree, to publish a "yellow book," which tells the family history and the honors which may have been brought to it by any of its members. In this case, in addition to her father's attainments, the book recorded the fact that an uncle, who was first lieutenant in the Chinese navy, lost his life in the battle of Port Arthur.

A little over a year ago the daughter came to this country, intending to remain a few years for study, to fit herself to do work among the women of her native land. She entered one of our seminaries, and her simplicity and charming manner, together with her beautiful Christian spirit, won hosts of friends. With deep regret she gave up her studies here and returned to China at her father's command, as he had betrothed her, according to Chinese custom, to a young Chinaman of good position, who had been educated in Scotland. Providentially her passage was taken on the very steamer which Li Hung Chang selected on his return to his native land. The rest of the story must be told in her own language, in a letter written to Miss Sites, the friend who accompanied her to America.

"We stopped for an hour at Victoria, just on account of Li. Many Chinese came on board to greet him. They all knelt before him to show their respect. One man brought along his little boy, only four or five years old, and when he knelt he was so cute everybody admired him. Li is very sensible, and just dresses and acts like any Chinese gentleman. I rather like him. He don't put on any airs, as I thought he would."

The next day she writes: "Such a wonderful thing has happened. How I wish you were with me when the great man Li walked past your little girl, and turned and looked at her with a real 'grandpapaly' expression! Immediately after he sent his interpreter to inquire who I am, where I came from, how long I have been abroad, what school I enter, etc. This man cannot talk our Foochow dialect, so he went and brought Mr. Lo, the Foochow secretary. We had quite a little talk, for, although he was a stranger and a Chinese man, I was so happy to again meet some one who could speak to me in my own dear native dialect. I went down to our cabin and got the "yellow book," which you remember I packed in my trunk. Mr. Lo took the book in to Li and came back, saying his Excellency wished to look it over, and was much interested to find I am the daughter of a titled man."

The diary letter continues the next day: "O, my heart is still jumping and my hands still trembling. Just come down from Li's room, you know! This morning he sent out the word, wants to see me at ten o'clock. Well, I want to tell you about the little affair in his room. As soon as he sent for me I come down to our cabin and put on my pretty silk suit and asked Miss Hartford (the missionary with whom she was traveling) to go up with me. When we came before him I knelt down real low, but the dear man, he rise from his seat, come and assist me up, and, bless you, he want to shake hands with me and we did! We sat down, while he asked me all about the family from father down to little sister Sa Muoi. He asked me how old I am, who is my English teacher, I told him you. After many more questions Li said he wished to appoint me to represent our dear China in the World's Congress of Representative Women, to be held in London in 1898. Just think! Your little girl having something to do with the Chinese Government! . . . The reason Li wants me to go is because he read my father's yellow book and he know who I am—my father's daughter and my uncle's niece. But I think it is most of all because I am your little girl. You taught me the English, brought me to America and sending me back at this time give me the chance to meet Li.

"He gave me three big books, histories of the World's Congresses, to keep. I am so glad to have something from him, such a great man, next to our emperor. I am glad, too, he has given me such an honor to carry home. I think father will be very pleased; you know he care so much for honors and this is from our government. I understand how God has the arrangement made before already and he put me on this trip with Li and is going to use me to shine for China. Don't worry about your little girl should be proud or anything like that, but she will learn to be more meek than ever from her Jesus, her Master. I tell you it will be a great change for China on account of Li's visit to America and England. Why should China send a woman to meet with 'Representative Women of the World'? I thought Chinese Government shall never have anything to do with women, and now so soon this new way is opened for the poor girls and women to be accounted side by side with men."

This appointment was the result of a request made to the viceroy by Lady Aberdeen that he should send a representative to the coming congress. Even if something should occur to prevent this young lady from filling the position, the encouraging fact remains that this greatest man of the East was so favorably impressed with her character and attainments—the result of Christian training—as to select her for this honorable position. This is a most welcome incident to encourage those who are laboring to elevate the women of China. It is not probable that he had ever before shaken hands with a Chinese woman, and his action in doing this and rising from his seat to welcome this young Christian woman are remarkable evidences of his favor and appreciation.

During the interview it was decided that Dr. Hü King Eng, the first Chinese woman to study medicine in this country and to practice in her own land, should go to London to accompany this young lady. The letter continues: "Li commanded me to learn Mandarin thoroughly and to keep up my English also, because he desires me to go to Peking to see him just before we go to London in 1898, also when we come back we must carry the report to him at Peking, and then he will present us to the empress of our China. I trust the Father for all things and for this also. O, in some way you must help me! I know our work is getting greater and greater, so we—you and I together—must work to save this nation. And by and by, when we are through in this world, we will go to see our Heavenly Father, who is the 'Lord of Lords' and 'King of Kings,' and hand in hand together report our work before his throne. I think we are called to help and save China. He wants us to work; therefore it is his will to make Li notice and have something to say to your loving little girl, Marguerite."

In spite of her admiration for American ideas she is still a loyal Chinese, and writes: "The viceroy is not going to stop in Japan, and I am glad!" In another letter she says, "I was perfectly well on the board ship across the Pacific Ocean, and never had any seasick at all. We enjoyed being with the great man, Li Hung Chang."

There are many of these bright young Chinese girls in the different mission schools, and this occurrence strengthens our faith to believe that as they are fitted for usefulness One greater than Li will open doors of opportunity for gracious service for the King of Kings.

EQUAL TO THE EMERGENCY

BY FLORENCE HULL WINTERBURN

Many persons who perform their ordinary duties in an admirable manner become confused and helpless when some accident upsets the usual household routine. The more regular and unvaried their lives are the more apt they are to grow selfish, mechanical and timid, and as heroism consists in absolute forgetfulness of self, they are rendered incapable through their very liking for the ease and pleasantness that comes from order and quiet, for the sacrifices demanded by emergencies. One must have a warm, full-pulsed heart to be able at an instant's notice to tear down some laboriously constructed household altar in order to furnish material needed by a sufferer. Only a nature intrepidly affectionate and devoted could wrest the best linen sheets from the spare bed to make bandages, throw a sealskin jacket—nothing else being at hand—over a maid whose dress is on fire, or stand and see a burglar rob the safe of cherished jewels and family silver, without uttering a cry that would be fatally exciting to the sick husband, asleep in an adjoining room.

These are but typical instances of the opportunities for moral heroism life is continually furnishing. It is to be hoped that there are few young persons, even at that period which is admittedly most careless and indifferent, so self-absorbed as a girl I saw lately pass upstairs on her way from school, right by the open door of a room in which lay an aged relative nearly dead from a fall without an inquiry or an exclamation. That is a sort of self-command one scarcely desires to emulate. Preferable by far is the devotion even of the nervous, excitable creature, in whose judgment there can be little reliance placed, but who is to be depended upon for a sort of desperate courage at a critical moment and for an unhesitating sacrifice of self.

For it is, above all, the sacrifice of self that is needed in times of danger. Emergencies call for more than the doing of one's duty, unless, indeed, one have an exalted conception of duty. The calculating nature, however conscientious, will fail, but "love never faileth."

To unite calculation with generosity is to combine wisdom with love, and in the calm time that precedes storms this is what we ought to aim to do. There is such a thing as getting ready for the unexpected, and indeed the best way to avert disaster from our house is to have everything prepared for accidents. It seems sometimes as if there were really "a spirit of contrariness in events." For if you go upon a journey with arnica, adhesive plaster and restoratives nobody gets hurt, while the first time you leave these things at home you are sure to wish for them. Lock the pantry window twelve nights and it is probable that there is nothing there to tempt a tramp, while on the thirteenth night, when you have forgotten to turn the bolt, there will be cold roast fowls and pies for Sunday's dinner.

"Eternal vigilance is the price of safety," but who can be eternally vigilant? And since one cannot—since untoward events are certain, sooner or later, to throw the nicest provider out of balance—what can save us from the state of dismay or frantic alarm that will render us useless in time of need? Self-possession can be cultivated and is, nowadays, in schools and colleges, by "accident drills." But even the best schools are narrow, while life is broad. There is always an unexpected quantity in each coming day. Tomorrow may be doomsday. How are we to be ready for it? Let us always be ready with that greatest of all qualities—the power to lay down our life for our friend. So we may win the safety we are not too anxious over, for "he that loveth his life shall lose it."

OUR FLOWERING TREES AND SHRUBS

BY JOSEPHINE E. CRAGIN

A few quaint lines of Longfellow's repeat themselves over and over to me these days of early spring, when all nature is awaking to new life. Nature herself, in the guise of a kind old teacher, is represented as calling to the child, the learner:

> "Come wander with me," she said,
> "Into regions yet untrod;
> And read what is yet unread
> In the manuscripts of God."

Perhaps research in no branch of God's handwriting brings fuller reward than the study of our New England flowering trees and shrubs. To gain the greatest pleasure from them some knowledge of their haunts and habits is essential, as most of them remain in blossom but a brief time, and we may lose much by not seeking in the right time and place.

Allusion only can be made to a large group of the earliest to appear, the catkin-bearing trees and bushes, but they are objects of great beauty, laden with clusters of swaying, pendulous aments in delicate lines of sober grays and browns, with a suggestion of crimson and, as the blossom matures, of yellow. This class includes the oaks and birches, the willows, poplars and alders, the lowly, fragrant sweet fern and, one of the most interesting among them, sweet-gale, which must be sought on the banks of a water-course, often leaning far over, as if to admire its own grace and beauty, and sending far out over the water with every breath of wind great clouds of pollen, like purest, finest gold dust.

The vision of a spice-bush, or benzoin, in blossom on a sunny April morning is one not to be forgotten. The clear, pure yellow, like a bit of sky at sunset, gives it the appearance of being aglow with light, and if, as I have seen it, growing on a small island just beyond reach—for it likes the low-lying meadow lands—its charm is enhanced. It is to April what witch-hazel is to October. Sometimes the dried and powdered berries are used for spice, and in our latest war the leaves were substituted for tea.

Its relative, the sassafras, blooms a little later, having also small, yellow and fragrant blossoms. Its uses are manifold, every part being utilized in some practical manner. The berries are so eagerly sought by birds that few are left to ripen. Not only is it useful and beautiful, with its odd, mitten-shaped leaves, but historic. The aromatic roots formed part of the first cargo ever exported from Massachusetts, and it is said its fragrance reached Columbus and enabled him to persevere and convince his mutinous crew that land was near.

The white, flat-topped clusters of the wayfaring tree appear in May, and the creamy white of the red-berried elder, whose brilliant scarlet berries are the earliest of all fruits to ripen. There is not much fear that the shad bush, with sweet, snowy masses of bloom, will be overlooked. The pear shaped edible fruit ripens in June, giving another name, Juneberry, while still another, serviceberry, was given because the Indians gathered and used such great quantities of the fruit.

The cherries follow quickly and add greatly to the beauty of the landscape—the close-growing clumps of chokecherry, its numberless round spikes of pure white lighting up roadsides and fence corners, the slender wild red cherry, whose petals fall so soon, while a wild black cherry tree in full blossom cannot be surpassed for elegance.

It is noticeable that most May blossoming shrubs are white flowered. Rhodora is a bright exception—rhodora, sung by Emerson, "rival of the rose." Patches of the vivid color adorn rocky pastures and lanes, giving a wonderful charm, like a bit of brightness in a somber picture.

By and by it will give place to lambkill, one of Thoreau's favorite flowers. "Small, ten-sided, rosy-crimson basins," perfect miniatures in form of the larger kalmias, gems of beauty, growing side by side with inconspicuous but fragrant wax myrtle or bayberry. In our great-grandmother's days the small gray berries were carefully gathered and the tallow extracted for candles. I think they must have retained some of the sweetness which these crushed leaves exhale.

Wild roses enliven these pasture lands in early summer, perfect flowers of purest pink, well-deserved favorites of artist and poet. The pale green, drooping tassels of moosewood, and racemes of mountain maple, the scarlet and yellow of the various kinds of larger maples, early develop into the curious "keys." These inclose the winged seeds which the winds are soon to distribute far and wide. The winds are our great natural seed sowers, doing their best to replace the forests which man relentlessly destroys.

The two chief sources of all true knowledge are education and inspiration. Education is development of the personal powers; inspiration breathes into man new truths. You may educate one through all his years, yet if you teach him nothing new he has been but little favored. Education is conservative; inspiration is progressive. Education is timid; inspiration is daring and brave.—D. O. Mears.

Closet and Altar

Your life needs days of retirement, when it shuts the gates upon the noisy whirl of action and is alone with God.

The true fast is the making of an emptiness about the soul that the higher fullness may fill it.

We know that we are made in the image of God because we cannot in our best moments accept any standard but this—of perfection to be sought after through eternity; the grandeur of our being is that there will always be something beyond for us to seek. —Lucy Larcom.

Even men have felt, when they suffered supremely in submission to God, that their submissive souls sprang into freer sympathy with God and understanding of his plans; what then must it have been for him who was God, self-clouded in humanity for a while, when, submissive to the Godhood in his suffering, the cloud broke from him and the long exile was finished, and the divinity of the Son swept through the encumbrance of the human life and laid itself close to the divinity of the Father.—Phillips Brooks.

O God, O kinsman loved, but not enough,
  O man with eyes majestic after death,
Whose feet have toiled along our pathways rough,
  Whose lips drawn human breath;

By that one likeness which is ours and thine,
  By that one nature which doth hold us kin,
By that high heaven where sinless thou dost shine,
  To draw us sinners in;

By thy last silence in the judgment hall,
  By long foreknowledge of the deadly tree,
By darkness, by the wormwood and the gall,
  I pray thee visit me.

It is easy enough for us to bring our palm branches to the church today. It is easy enough to shout our hosannas, to sing our hymns and swell his worship; but are we owning him as King of men? Are we giving his throne a place in our hearts? Are we taking his precepts into our lives? Is he our King, King of that kingdom which is within? If not, he is weeping as truly on this Palm Sunday morning, sad in the midst of all the homage, as he was on the first one we are commemorating. If he is, then he is receiving it as truly as when his disciples in their sincerity shouted, Hosanna.—Reginald H. Howe.

O thou, who comest from Edom, glorious in thy apparel, traveling in the greatness of thy strength, who speaketh in righteousness, mighty to save, graciously behold thy people who call upon thee. In all our affliction thou wast afflicted and the angel of thy presence saved us. Thou who didst tread the winepress alone, when of the people there was none with thee, see now the travail of thy soul and be satisfied. To thee, sacrificed for us, do we here and now in thy presence and in the week of thy Passion present ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy and living sacrifice unto thee, beseeching thee so to strengthen us by thy grace that we may both follow the example of thy patience and also be made partakers of thy resurrection, who art with the Father and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

29. CHARADE

The princess, Anne of Cleves, was ne'er called fair,
E'en by her spouse; and so the FIRST, allied in part
To her, she only would allow to share
The smallest particle of space in her warm heart.

The politician hustles, far and near,
That, like the sportsman, he may get the NEXT or TWO;
And of the people's censure feels no fear,
Provided his base "tools" prove to his orders true.

The LAST e'er fills a high and valued place,
And voices well the cause of Country, Heart and Home.
To find the WHOLE you'll need a world-wide race
To run, and e'en to earth's far-off extreme to roam.

I clasp the soft, the slim, the fair;
In fairy fêtes I take a part;
And jeweled crowns with kings I share,
While planets move within my heart.

Some good folk will not have me near,
Yet I may boast a friend or two;
Though tales of bloody strife, I fear,
When I'm about, are all too true!

Around the world, from place to place
I run, yet never reach a home;
But then [said he of Cæsar's race]
"All good roads lead one on to roam [Rome]!"

T. OSCAR immortality did share
With LUXLOP, whom he loved with all his heart.

The goddess of the groves was IFO NEAR.
RICH BADSY was a monster—one of two
Who filled the hearts of mariners with fear.
SAM RUPY and HIS BET were lovers true.

SLY SUSE, adversely driven from place to place,

33. ARITHMETICAL

How would you divide 348 into seven parts so that the first part is two greater than the second, two less than the third, twice the fourth, one-half the fifth, the square of the sixth and the square root of the seventh?

34. ENIGMA

I'm found in bright but not in fair,
In fragment, too, though not in part;
Part of a plough, though not the share,
And "Tangles" hugs me to his heart.

I'm always nigh, though never near;
In figures found, though not in two;
I help to fright, but never fear;
I'm always right, though hardly true.

Within a range, but not in place;
I share a dwelling far from home;
I gallop hard, but never race;
Though always strange I never roam.

A SUNDAY FOR BRAIN WORKERS

Frank R. Stockton urges the necessity of brain workers taking an additional rest day during the week, for the reason that all the exercises and observances proper to Sunday are merely a continuation of his ordinary labors. But he does not advocate that the brain worker should give up his Sunday. He says:

> He has as much right to his religious privileges as any one. But he also has a right to a day of rest, and this Sunday does not give him. . . . It is the want of this day of rest which has so great an influence in the early breakdown of the head worker. Clergymen, lawyers, writers, and many other classes of brain workers, find themselves victims to nervous exhaustion and similar disorders when they ought to be in the prime of their vigor, and this, in great measure, because they are deprived of a true Sabbath. The teacher fares much better, when, in common with his scholars, he has a holiday in the week.
> We would not interfere in the slightest degree with the institutions or customs ordained by society and religion. We would not favor the passage of any social decree which would give the brain worker a perfect immunity to play tennis, to go fishing, or to work in his garden, or at his turning lathe, while his neighbors were at church or at Sunday school. We do not wish him to be set apart as a social invalid, allowed to do things that others must not do, and to be excused from duties which others are expected to perform. He does not wish to be thus set apart, and, in most cases, would not avail himself of these privileges if they were offered him. As a rule, he has as strong religious instincts as any one else, and wishes to go to church with his neighbors. Who would care to be hoeing beans in a straw hat and old shirt and trousers while the Sunday bells were ringing and his neighbors in their Sunday clothes were walking churchward past his garden? And how even less pleasant would it be, bait-smeared and sunburned, and carrying a string of fish, to meet these good people, in long procession, coming out of church. Would a special privilege put one at his ease? To the respectable brain worker, who desires for himself and family a good position in society, such exceptional and peculiar privileges would give no pleasure, and, consequently, would do no good. He wishes to work among his flowers and his vines when other people are working among theirs, and he can only enjoy outdoor sports and indoor exercises at such times when his friends and neighbors also think proper to enjoy them. He wants one day in seven when he can give his brain the rest and his body the exercise that they need, and this day cannot be Sunday. He must have a Sabbath which shall fall on a week day. Head workers who have their times of labor under their own control should think seriously of this matter, and consider whether or not their brains are obeying the commandment, "Six days shalt thou labor." It is a matter of grave importance if one wishes to work profitably during a natural life.

The great emotions are not meant to come to us daily in their unqualified strength. God knows how to dilute his elixirs for the soul. His fine, impalpable air spread round the earth is not more cunningly mixed from pungent gases for our hourly breath than life itself is thinned and toned that we may receive and bear it.—Mrs. Whitney.

The Conversation Corner

DEAR CORNERERS: Having dispatched (in an innocent way) all the Pets of a general character last week, I intended next to attack the "stack of black cats," and otherwise colored members of the feline race, about whom their fond owners have from time to time written us. But to my dismay when I went up into the composing-room on the proper day to see if the proof was all right I found it was not all right, for D. F.'s blue pencil had made a long mark to show how much must come out if those two sledfuls of pets went in. That excluded the strangest pet of all. Here it is, with other letters which will be surely cut of date before we get through with those cats!

You remember that a few weeks ago (Feb. 11) the horned toad was up for discussion and inquiry was made about that California boy who sent us the original specimen, which we named Callie-Ollie.

POMONA, CAL.

Dear Mr. Martin: I still live in California. I will send you a horned toad that you can keep—warranted not to run away.

OLIVER C.

Remembering our experience in 1889, we opened that box with great care—but he didn't jump out at all. He was finely stuffed and mounted on a card. He is just four inches long from the tip of his horned head to the tip of his spiny tail. Phrynosoma cornuta sits on my mantel in state—and he is handsome! I just showed him to a boy who came in to get some Newfoundland stamps. Our Cornerer's card says that he has a Wood Working Establishment, "Caliifornia Curios," etc., and a local paper says that he was awarded a diploma for the best display of lathe work. I have the impression that he was a New Hampshire and Massachusetts boy, who went out there for his health, but I am not sure. (By the looks of his photograph he must have got what he went for!)

So many of our members are interested in Nantucket, either as visitors there, or as descendants from its early settlers, I will quote from some of the letters following our Nantucket page (of Jan. 28).

NANTUCKET.

My Dear Mr. Martin: Thanks for full account of "the shearing." You will be glad to hear that I am connected with all those old families and that I am descended from the Coffins through the Starbucks! Thomas Macy was my sixth great-grandfather in five different lines; Thomas Barnard, Tristram Coffin, Richard Gardner and Nathaniel Starbuck were all my sixth great-grandfathers. The "haul-over" which you mention visiting is no more. In a recent heavy storm the ocean cut a channel to the harbor at that point, so that the upper part of the island is cut off from the main part and become a separate island.

JULIA B.

DORCHESTER, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I was very much interested in the article about Nantucket. Tristram Coffin was an ancestor of my papa, whose home was at Martha's Vineyard. I go there every summer to see my grandma. There is a blind man down there named Daniel who does all sorts of errands. He goes all around the town with a bell to let the people know if there is to be an entertainment or an excursion. He is called the "town crier." I enjoy the boating at Edgartown. I can row a boat with two oars. Gay Head is at the extreme western part of Martha's Vineyard. I spent the night there at an Indian's house. The Indian woman had a little "Indian pig," who was afraid of me. The clay cliffs of Gay Head are noted for their beautiful colors. When moist the clay is easily cut.

HELEN C.

I wonder if Helen is right in using "who" in the last sentence but two. Who is usually understood to refer to persons and which to animals and things, but occasionally exception is made in favor of who when it relates to the nobler animals. But I think the line ought to be drawn this side of a pig!

This is from a more distant State:

. . . That article will call up many responses in feeling if not in words, for those who are Nantucket-born never lose their interest in the quaint old island. I well remember the old shearing times. I don't think there was anything like it in the country. Extra steamers would be put on to bring the crowds from the continent. For months previous the boys and girls would save every penny they could for "shearing money." A little way outside the great sheep inclosures were erected several large refreshment tents, in which everything eatable and drinkable was sold. There was no restriction of prohibitory laws then, and gambling in different forms was as open as day. There was a large springboard platform for dancing, and "blind Frank," whom I well remember, would saw away on his old fiddle, as only he could do. There were lots of whale ships then, and the returned whalemen with their best girls would make things lively on the platform. In the forenoon we boys would engage with the owners to catch their marked sheep and carry them to the shearing tents, and thus earn some money to spend in refreshments. Between you and me, it was there that I drank my first glass of wine, which eventually led me to a whaler's life and to regrets unspeakable that my mother never lived to hear from her wayward boy.

Perhaps the gentleman did not intend me to print this, so that if you chance to meet him at the C. E. Convention in San Francisco this summer, you need not tell him that I have done so! I copied it to show that there is a sad side of such scenes, which seem so jolly. On the whole, I do not believe those old-fashioned festivals, as "shearing," "musters," and the like, were half as enjoyable as our modern modes of recreation by vacation trips to the seashore or the mountains. (I always except Nevada prize fights, which are worse even than Spanish bull-fights, by as much as a man is better than an animal!)

LANCASTER, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: Apropos of your remarks in the Nantucket Corner, allow me to quote the old lines which I have heard there, containing some of the old names of the town.

The Rays and Russels coopers are,
The knowing Folgers lazy;
A lying Colman very rare,
And scarce a learned Hussey;
The Coffins, noisy, fractious, loud,
The silent Gardners, plodding;
The Mitchells good, the Barkers proud,
The Macys eat the pudding.

E. F. M.

Is this lady a Mitchell or a Macy, or descended in five different lines from all the rest? If some of the adjectives seem rather uncomplimentary, we must allow something for the necessities of rhyme, and remember that in a few generations the various elements in combination ought to make well-rounded character!

Mr. Martin

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK

The Kaiser Children's Great-Grandmother is Queen Victoria, as stated over their picture in the Corner of March 11, but she is not their great-grandmother "twice over" as was also there stated. This was not the mistake of the C. children who wrote about them, but my own mistake, which has been kindly corrected by a lady in Springfield, a lady in Saratoga, a lady in Michigan and the wife of a well-known doctor of divinity in Chicago. The mistake came from confounding two brothers of nearly the same name. One was Frederick Christian Augustus; the other was Frederick Christian Charles Augustus, both princes of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Augustenburg. The latter married Princess Helena Augusta Victoria, daughter of Queen Victoria. Seeing that Wilhelm married a daughter of Frederick Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, "I said in my haste" that "I suppose you know," etc., without stopping to know that I didn't know it myself!

I will take it all back now, and inform you that, according to my best knowledge and belief, Friedrich Wilhelm Victor Albert (that is, Wilhelm II., King of Prussia and Emperor of Germany, himself a grandson of Albert Francis Augustus Charles Emmanuel, Prince Consort, and Alexandrina Victoria, Queen of England and Empress of India) married Princess Augusta Victoria Frederika Louise Theodora Jenny, daughter of the aforesaid Prince Frederick Christian Augustus and Adelaide Victoria Amelia Louise Marie Constance. That is, it was her uncle and not her father who married Princess Helena! I have called her father Prince Frederick, but "I suppose you know" that when King Christian IX. of a new dynasty succeeded Frederick VII. (in 1863) as king of Denmark, under whose rule these duchies Schleswig-Holstein had been, this Prince Frederick suddenly appeared at Kiel (the terminus of the famous canal) and proclaimed himself Duke, under title of Frederick VIII. A short, sharp and decisive war was waged between Austria and Prussia on one side and Denmark on the other, resulting through Bismarck's diplomacy in the dispossession of the Duke and the making of Holstein-Schleswig Holstein a part of Germany. So it was afterwards (in 1881) considered a very amicable arrangement to have the future Emperor William marry the daughter of the dispossessed Duke.

More Royal Cousinhood. As a matter of fact, I think the Kaiser children are related in a second way to the Queen of England, although I cannot at this moment verify my "think," and I must be careful about stating anything to you keen-eyed Cornerers which has not been amply confirmed and corroborated! But was not the brave and beautiful Queen Louise, mother of old Kaiser Wilhelm, a kind of cousin to the Duke of Kent, Victoria's father? Certainly Charlotte, the wife of George III., and Duke Charles, the father of Louise, both belonged to the Mecklenbug-Strelitz set!

You say that is a long time ago and does not concern us. But it is of special interest now to remember that George I., "king of the Hellenes," is a son of Christian IX., king of Denmark (who was son of another Duke Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glücksburg!), and so a brother of the Princess of Wales and also of Dagmar, Dowager Empress of Russia and mother of the reigning Czar. Then King George's wife, Olga, is daughter of the Grand Duke Constantine, brother of Alexander II. of Russia, and his son, the Crown Prince, married Kaiser William's sister. Besides, "I suppose you know" that Nicholas II., the Czar, married Princess Alice of Hesse, granddaughter of Queen Victoria, and that the Queen's son, Alfred, Duke of Edinburgh, married the Grand Duchess Marie, the daughter of Alexander II. and aunt of the Czar. The importance of these "double-and-twisted" relationships is in the hope that they might prevent England, if not Russia and Germany, from continuing in the support of the Great Assassin, who is the relative of nobody and enemy of everybody, as against the plucky king of Greece, who is, as Mr. Gladstone says, "a David, facing six Goliaths"—facing them in the interest of freedom, right and Christianity against despotism, oppression and barbarous persecution!

GENTILES CONVERTED AT ANTIOCH

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

Next to Jerusalem the most important city in the history of the primitive church was some 300 miles north of it—Antioch in Syria. No event since the gift of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost is so important in that history as this at Antioch. Here was formed the first church which was called Christian, and into which Gentiles were received without becoming Jews. The three topics presented in this chapter are:

I. Salvation for the Gentiles. It is difficult for us to understand the excited feeling with which the Christian Jews at Jerusalem must have discussed the act of Peter admitting Cornelius into the church. Hardly a dozen years before the townspeople of Jesus had sought to kill him because he hinted that such a thing was possible [Luke 4: 29]. The unrecorded steps may be imagined by which the disciples at Jerusalem came to admit that "to the Gentiles also hath God granted repentance unto life." But among significant things connected with this movement are these:

1. It began through the death of Stephen. Luke repeatedly points to that as the starting point of new growth for the church. That tragedy sent Philip to preach in Samaria, and Peter to Lydda and Joppa and through the plains of Sharon and thus to Cæsarea, where he met Cornelius. It sent missionaries through Phœnicia and Cyprus and Syria [v. 19]. Few men have done so much good in their lives as Stephen did in his death, over which devout men made great lamentation. If they had known what was to result from his death they would have rejoiced in it. What seems the greatest calamity may prove to have been the greatest service of those who have consecrated their lives to do the will of God.

2. This movement was carried forward by unknown men. Their names are not given in the Bible. "Men of Cyprus and Cyrene" first began "preaching the Lord Jesus" to Gentiles. The church had not sent them to do this. Probably they had no idea what was to come of it. They just seized the opportunity to tell of the new religion in which they were so much interested.

Some of the most significant movements in Christian history have begun through men simply doing for the love of Christ what lay at their hand. Luther declaring that men are justified by faith, Tyndale translating the Bible into English, the Pilgrims sailing for the new world, were building far better than they knew. To do well what we find to do for Christ, without a thought of fame, may be to find the most important place in history.

3. This movement was sealed by the divine approval. No bishop set these men apart for their work. Probably the church at that time would not have permitted them to preach to Greeks had its consent been asked. But "the hand of the Lord was with them." That is the best test. The Salvation Army was treated with contempt when it began. It has proved its genuineness, in spite of much which provokes criticism, by the fact that "a great number that believed turned unto the Lord."

II. The mission of Barnabas to Antioch. He also was from Cyprus and knew something about the Greeks at Antioch and the men who were preaching to them. The church at Jerusalem showed its willingness to be guided by the Holy Spirit by sending this informed and impartial man to investigate the work at Antioch. Too often, when the churches feel called on to pronounce judgment on new movements, they choose investigators whom they expect will prove that the Holy Spirit confirms the opinion they already hold. This they call defending the truth.

Barnabas was a typical evangelist. He spoke to what was best in men and expected an answer. Of course, he got it. He laid emphasis, not, as too many evangelists now do on how bad his hearers were, but on how good they might become through faith in Christ. He saw the grace of God in the new life of the believing Greeks in Antioch. He saw also that their faith and purpose needed strengthening. He was filled with the Holy Spirit. He believed in the sincerity of their conversion. His exhortations were earnest and confident. Not only were believers confirmed, but many others became believers.

Barnabas was the discoverer of Paul. Several years had passed since the young rabbi had visited Jerusalem, had been regarded with suspicion by the brethren and had found a friend in Barnabas. Probably most of them had forgotten him. But now, when a great revival was in progress at Antioch and Barnabas could not do all that was required, he went to Tarsus and made diligent search for Saul. He found him and persuaded him to come and join in the missionary work.

We owe a greater debt than we realize to the discoverers of great men. Who knows how much the world owes to the schoolmasters of Milton and Shakespeare? It is quite possible that Paul would not have appeared in New Testament records had it not been for Barnabas. Who remembers the name of the man who one day laid his hand on the shoulder of John B. Gough and called him to his splendid ministry for temperance? It may be that some now within the influence of pastors and Sunday school teachers unknown to fame have capacities for usefulness far beyond the faith of their teachers.

III. The ministry of Saul in Antioch. He had had a splendid education when he was converted, and already had become a prominent leader in the Jewish Church. The whole world was waiting for the gospel. Yet six years at least passed before he began to appear as a missionary, and three of these he spent in absolute retirement in Arabia. He never expressed regret for the use he made of those years. Is the need of haste now so much greater that young men cannot spend time for adequate preparation, but must take short cuts into the ministry because impelled to do so by the Holy Spirit?

Saul was willing to begin his ministry under Barnabas, although far better equipped for it than he. For a whole year he labored at Antioch as a teacher, though very little is said about it. But under his ministry there the new principles which Christ had taught [Matt. 28: 19; Acts 1: 8], but which his disciples had thus far failed to apprehend, came to be distinctly recognized. Before that time outsiders had regarded disciples of Christ as only another sect of the Jews. Perhaps they had hardly thought of themselves in any other light. But now that a church had been organized in Antioch of those who were not Jews a new name was necessary to distinguish them. They were called Christians—those who belong to Christ—and this name they have borne ever since. Under Saul and Barnabas at Antioch the Christian Church first took an independent place in the world.

These Gentile Christians soon showed their breadth and nobility of character by a practical expression of their love to their Jewish brethren and their faith in the oneness of the church. They anticipated the needs of their fellow-Christians in Judæa whom they had never seen. They gave "every man according to his ability," and sent their gifts by Barnabas and Saul to the elders at Jerusalem.

The church at Antioch was the door through which Christianity passed out of Judæa into the world, the place where the church first realized the sentiment of human brotherhood, the point at which it claimed for Gentile nations an independent entrance into the kingdom of God. The student who masters this lesson will have found the key to much that would be otherwise obscure in the Acts and Epistles, and will have discovered the spirit of Christianity which is universal, conditioned only on loyalty to Christ.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM

A CYCLE OF CATHAY

(Parallel with The Congregationalist's May Topic for Missionary Meetings.)

General Grant, after visiting China, said he realized that while progress in the Mississippi valley might be that of the avalanche, in the valley of the Yang-tze it could be only that of the glacier. The aptness of this comparison cannot be questioned, but as we review the last sixty years in the Celestial Empire we find abundant evidence that China is moving as surely and steadily as, if not more rapidly than, a glacier, and that the breath of God is melting the icy fetters of a venerable and conservative civilization.

Protestant missions in China may be divided into three stages. The first, from 1807, when Dr. Morrison went to Canton and Macao, to 1842, was a period of preparation. The pioneers waiting without the impenetrable wall might well have echoed the despairing cry of a mediæval Roman missionary: "O Rock, Rock, when wilt thou open!" In 1842 five ports became accessible, and then came the second or "treaty-port period of restricted beginnings." It was not, however, until 1860 that existing treaties were made, opening the interior to missionaries, and the third stage, one of general aggressive work, did not actually begin until 1865.

As a heading for this article we have appropriated the title of Dr. W. A. P. Martin's interesting new book. From the prelude to China's first war with England to the present time is, roughly speaking, about sixty years, the length of a Chinese cycle. This is a convenient period for tracing the growth of Christianity and Western civilization in China, since no extensive missionary operations were begun until the close of the so-called Opium War. How radical a change has been wrought in the attitude toward foreign nations is set forth in the statement of Dr. Wells Williams, that when in 1833 with two other Americans he arrived at Canton they were reported to the authorities as foreign devils who had come to live under Chinese tutelage; but in 1874, as secretary to the American embassy at Peking, he accompanied the minister when he presented his letters of credence to the Emperor Tungchih and was received with perfect equality!

Let us glance at some of the results of this half-century or more of missionary effort. In the year 1843 there were six Christian converts in China. Now there are over 500 organized churches, with about 60,000 communicants and 100,000 adherents. As early as 1839 the American Board sent Bridgman to this field, the pioneer of its present force of 117 missionaries and 295 native laborers in its four Chinese missions. Shanghai and Tientsin are strategic centers for the operations of many large missionary societies. Within the imperial city of Peking are several strong stations. The China Inland Mission alone has between five and six hundred workers preaching the gospel in the once inaccessible interior provinces. Scotch and Irish Presbyterians are making numerous converts in Manchuria, Mongolia has been invaded by James Gilmour of the L. M. S. and a Norwegian missionary is now lifting the banner of the cross in Urga, the home of 10,000 Lamas, the religious center of the whole of Mongolia. Isolated outposts on the borders of Thibet and in other far western provinces are prophecies of the time when a line of mission stations shall be established from Tientsin to Urga in Mongolia, from Shanghai to T'aochow in Kan-suh, from Canton to Lungchow in Kuongsi and Langson in Annam.

Steamers, telegraphs, railways and other accompaniments of civilization to be found in the empire were introduced under the pressure of war, actual or imminent. With what reluctance these innovations were made may be seen from the fact that when, about 1860, the first wire in the empire was stretched from Shanghai to Woosung by an English merchant it was demolished by a mob with the connivance of the authorities. A year or two later the first railway was opened at Shanghai by an English company. Finding no other way of injuring the enterprise, the Chinese authorities promptly purchased the plant and destroyed it. China's appreciation of Western learning and skill, however, has marvelously increased since the recent war with Japan. Railroad lines are now being projected from the large cities to distant border towns. Numerous industries are springing up, such as the mining of coal and iron, cotton manufactures, flour mills, match factories, etc. A military school under German instructors to be established in Nanking and a naval college under English supervision opened in the same city indicate the desire of the Chinese to avail themselves at last of Western science in warfare. It is interesting also to read in the current Missionary Herald that Dr. Wing, a graduate of Yale University, has been recently ordered to Peking to discuss with the Foreign Office the practicability of establishing a national banking system. Yung Wing will be remembered as one of three Chinese youth from a mission school in Hong-Kong brought by Dr. S. R. Brown to this country to be educated. It was he who conceived the idea and became the leader of the "educational mission" which brought 120 Chinese lads to the United States fifteen or twenty years ago. He afterwards held the position of secretary of the Chinese legation in Washington.

Li Hung Chang has convinced the world that China can produce leaders who will bear comparison with the great statesmen of any nation. No less prominent in his own land is Prince Kung, who for the past thirty-five years has represented the Manchu race as Viceroy Li has represented the Chinese. The prince is the son of one emperor, the brother of a second and the uncle of the present ruler. The chapter in Dr. Martin's book entitled Notable Mandarins describes several other eminent men of rank, and is well worth reading. The Dowager Tszehi, who after a regency of nearly thirty years is still the greatest power behind the throne, deserves a word of admiration. Even a Christian woman might not be able to bear the strain of having to share the regency for many years with another wife of her imperial husband. "It is not a little to their praise that they reigned together more harmoniously than the joint kings of Sparta or the joint emperors of Rome," writes the author of A Cycle of Cathay. The course taken by these two representative Chinese ladies during the great famine in Shansi shows a Christlike sympathy with their subjects unsurpassed in the annals of any nation. Learning that the cost of the meats for their table was seventy-five dollars a day, they announced that they would eat no more flesh food while their people were starving, and ordered the money thus saved to be paid into the relief fund.

One of the most hopeful indications of a lessening conservatism is the new regard for enlightened educational methods. Numerous mission schools have long been laying foundations and sending forth hundreds of Christian youth. Some, like the North China College of the American Board, have developed from modest boarding schools into representative institutions of higher education. A progressive step on the part of the government, several years ago, was the founding of the Tungwen Imperial College in Peking, with Dr. Martin, a Presbyterian ex-missionary, as president and a corps of Western professors. The prime object of this institution is to train young men of rank for the public service, especially as agents of international intercourse. Among its students all nine grades of Mandarins, except the first, are represented. The teachers chosen to give English lessons to the emperors were two of its alumni. The war with Japan has given an impetus to schools for Western learning. From the North China Daily News we learn that the Peking Government has recently issued instructions to the various viceroys and governors to establish schools for teaching the English language and Western sciences in all the principal cities of the empire. China, it is said, in order to keep herself on terms of equality and in touch with the great Powers of Europe, "must educate the masses and encourage inventive genius and foreign learning among her people." Dr. Henry Blodget is authority for the statement that the Chinese are enlarging their college for Western learning in Nanking and, not content with this, are opening another institution of high grade in the same city. Three similar schools are to be opened in Hangchow and one in Suchow.

One dark page cannot be overlooked in reviewing the past few decades in China. It has been truly said that "if the first stage in the recent history of missions was their toleration by edict and the second the recognition of their legal status by treaty compact, the systematic attempt to crush them out by mob violence may be regarded as a third stage." Since 1870 there have been twenty or more anti-foreign—not altogether anti-mission—riots, culminating in the massacre at Kucheng. The causes and circumstances of recent riots are too well known to need reviewing here. It is a comfort to be able to turn our thoughts to the great spiritual awakening throughout the country which has characterized the past year, and to read such joyful letters as appear in the Missionary Herald from month to month, telling of eager listeners, earnest inquirers, converts steadfast in persecution, churches assuming self-support. No country in the world has greater possibilities than China, and nowhere else has the Christian Church such opportunities. The words of John Angell James, "China for Christ though it take a thousand years," should be the watchword for redoubled effort and enthusiasm.

Congressman Barrows of the Massachusetts Tenth, after sixteen years' service as editor of the Christian Register, now resigns that post, to take up service for society in a sphere where we are sure he will be equally serviceable. Already his voice has been heard protesting against reactionary legislation. In laying down his pen and symbol of authority Mr. Barrows says some things about religious journalism and its changes which deserve to be quoted, and pondered over. He asserts that "in these years [1880–1896] modern journalism has grown more exacting. Religious weeklies feel the new stimulus and the new demand as certainly as they are felt in secular journalism. . . . The later period of business depression . . . has been a hard one for journalists everywhere when the simple physical basis of support is considered." Of his able colleague, his wife, he says, generously and truly, "Without her constant and unfailing help, her practical ability, her wise counsel, facility and inspiration, the work which has been almost an unbroken joy would have been too great a burden." But especially notable are his words to his fellow-editors of the religious press. Emerging from the smoke of conflicts, in which he says he has tried to "strike hard for principles, but to avoid personalities," he sets forth the rule respecting controversy which is more and more dominating the religious press today and differentiating it from that of earlier eras. Of course now and then a specimen of the old style is seen, such as The Interior's recent attack on Dr. Lyman Abbott, but the profession as a whole is realizing that it has a higher duty than to hurl epithets.

THE LIQUOR PROBLEM

Readers of The Century Magazine and The Forum during the last eight years will remember a series of papers on sociological subjects written by Prof. R. T. Ely, Dr. C. W. Shields, Prof. W. M. Sloane, Pres. Seth Low and others. These gentlemen, known as the Sociological Group, in 1893 enlarged their number to fifty and concentrated their attention on the liquor problem in the United States. Four sub-committees were appointed to study and report upon different aspects of the drink problem, i. e., its physiological, legislative, economic and ethical aspects. The sub-committee on the legislative aspects has made a report, which is published under the authority of the whole committee, in a volume called The Liquor Problem in Its Legislative Aspects. Its authors are Messrs. F. H. Wines and John Koren. Presidents Eliot and Low and Mr. J. C. Carter are the sub committee under whose direction the authors made their investigation and now offer their report.

The most careful and impartial study has been made for several years of the liquor problem in Maine, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri and South Carolina, and the results of the whole are embodied in this volume. Several different systems for the regulation of the liquor traffic were found to have been put in operation, but with substantially similar results. The degree of success attained in prohibiting or regulating the business of course has varied in different States, and at different times within the same State, but the general impression received by the reader must be that substantially the same conclusion is indicated everywhere. This, however, the reader is left to infer for himself to a large degree. The investigators and the committee do not hesitate to utter their own convictions, but they confine themselves to the different fields examined, and we have noticed no attempt to formulate a general conclusion or to recommend any particular policy as universally applicable. But it is an inference inevitable to unprejudiced minds that prohibition, although occasionally successful in certain localities, especially in the rural districts, cannot be said on the whole to have accomplished any important beneficial general results.

In Maine, for example, despite the denials of some advocates of the policy, liquor drinking seems to be practically as unrestrained as anywhere else, and one result of prohibition almost invariably has been found to be the creation of a disregard for law and a disposition to evade or defeat the law, and even to perjure one's self recklessly for that end, which are quite as demoralizing to a community as drinking itself. The varieties of the license system also are open to more or less objection, some of them seeming to work well for a time, others to be more fruitful of evil than of advantage; and we do not see what opinion an intelligent and fair-minded reader can form at present beyond this, that the problem is as yet unsolvable in any thoroughly satisfactory manner, but that on the whole the license system may be so operated as to produce less evil than absolute prohibition. Yet there are many exceptions to such a statement as this, and we await the supplementary reports of the other sub committees with much interest, hoping that when they appear the combined result may be a mine of information and suggestion which shall point to some definite and evidently hopeful policy for the successful restriction, if not the entire abolition, of the liquor traffic. Meanwhile the authors of this book are entitled to credit and gratitude for their thorough and useful service. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.]

CHRISTIANITY AND IDEALISM

Dr. John Watson, professor of moral philosophy at Queen's University, Canada, has written here a striking volume—one of the early issues in a series projected by the Philosophical Union of the University of California. It is a natural sequel to its author's earlier work, Comte, Mill and Spencer. Psychologists and philosophers will appreciate it. It is a study of the Christian ideal of life in its relation to the Greek and Jewish ideals and to modern philosophy. No attempt is made at a complete presentation of the development of religion, but this is outlined in a general yet sufficient way. The development of the Christian ideal is examined as suggested by the synoptic gospels in the light of modern criticism. Purely doctrinal topics are avoided, and attention is concentrated upon the utterances of Jesus himself.

His attitude to the Jewish law and to the Messianic hopes of his countrymen is outlined effectively, and his opposition to the legalism of the Pharisees in suggesting a conception of righteousness consisting in active efforts for the uplifting of the soul. It is pointed out that he taught the immortality of man, basing it on belief in God and the essential identity of the divine and the human natures; gave a new interpretation to the conception of the kingdom of heaven as a spiritual community and to the belief in a final judgment; and taught that faith is that openness to light which is reason in its purest form. In considering the relation of modern idealism to the Christian ideal, the author goes even deeper into the discussion of his subject, raising objections to positions taken by many eminent thinkers, and concluding that the ultimate conception, by means of which existence must be explained, is a self-conscious and self-determining principle, and that, when the relation of the world, and especially of man, to the absolute is investigated, it appears that idealism is in essential harmony with the Christian ideal of life as held by Jesus, even though it appears to differ somewhat from popular Christian theology.

The evolutionary theory seems to be accepted, as contradicting the doctrine of the fall of man, and some of his other positions are opposed to some of the most generally accepted beliefs of the Christian Church. The doctrine of the atonement, for instance, defined as God's offering up his Son in man's stead, thus reconciling infinite justice with infinite mercy, is termed highly artificial and the production of conflicting ideas. And it is objected that sin and crime are not identical and that God is not a judge. There are elements of truth in these positions, but they do not embrace the whole truth. The author's object, however, is in harmony with Christian aims, and the tendency of his book will be to promote Christian thinking rather than to discourage it. [Macmillan Co. $1.25.]

RELIGIOUS

Life After Death and the Future of the Kingdom of God [Charles Scribner's Sons. Imported. $3.50] is a work by Bishop L. N. Dahle, translated by Rev. John Beveredge. The author is a bishop in the Norwegian Church and has been a missionary in Madagascar. He now has the whole charge of the missionary work of the church to which he belongs. His endeavor in this work has been to make a concise statement of the teachings of the Bible in regard to life after death. His work is written in a clear and natural manner, so that ordinary readers can take advantage of it, although it is scholarly in method and substance. It impresses the reader with the conviction that little can be known positively about the future life, that the Almighty designedly has left the human race substantially in ignorance on the subject. The author believes in an intermediate state, but does not seem to accept the theory that those in the intermediate state have bodies. He holds to the mutual recognition therein of believers. He regards Hades as neither for believers nor unbelievers, but for non-believers, that is, those to whom Christ has not been made known in this life. The theory of a future probation finds in him no support, and he only ventures to hope, although his hope is evidently strong, for the salvation of unbaptized children. Antichrist in his view is some particular person, and he discusses the many different theories as to who Antichrist means, concluding that he has not yet appeared, but will do so as the leader of the last bitter conflict against the kingdom of God before the Lord's advent. Future punishment he regards as being both literal and eternal, and the future home of the blest is to be this earth, entirely renewed and made holy. These hints at the positions which he takes indicate the character of the teachings of the book, and, as we have already said, they are presented in a scholarly, practical and reverent manner.

Dr. Alfred Cave's Introduction to Theology [Charles Scribner's Sons. Imported. $4.50] appeared first some ten years ago and was received with much favor. Its bibliographical lists, which were prominent features, were appreciated especially. The work has now been brought down to date and reissued and is a scholarly study of its subject from the standpoint of the essential nature of religion. It offers a scientific treatment of a singular and unique class of facts—the facts of religion. It is not, however, a complete exposition of its subject, but is systematic, consistent, well matured and valuably suggestive. The bibliographies under each head have been, of course, much enlarged for this edition and will prove a great convenience to all theological students. The book deserves hearty commendation.

Out of the Cain Life Into the Christ Life [F. H. Revell Co. $1.25] is by Rev. Henry Ostrom, an evangelist. It contains certain discourses or addresses evidently used by him in his evangelistic labors. They are practical and earnest appeals intended to quicken piety and to lead the unconverted to Christ. Free use is made of illustrative material and they are good examples of evangelistic preaching.——Possibilities [F. H. Revell Co. 75 cents] contains eight sermons by Rev. J. G. K. McClure. They have the best characteristics of good preaching, simplicity, terseness and spirituality.

From a Cloud of Witnesses [Curts & Jennings. $1.00], by D. W. Clark, contains over 300 tributes to the Bible by men of more or less eminence, most of them distinguished, all of them sufficiently thoughtful to render their opinions worth quoting. The most of the material thus gathered is impressive and the work is thoroughly indexed and many a minister will find it suggestive and be glad to quote from it occasionally.——The Babe of Bethlehem [H. L. Hastings. 50 cents] is by H. L. Hastings. It is a long rhyme, printed in the form of prose, about Christ's infancy and childhood, and the love of Christ for children. It is clear and its rhythmical flow will please many childish hearers.

BIOGRAPHICAL

The autobiography of the late Rev. Julian M. Sturtevant, D. D. [F. H. Revell Co. $1.25] has been edited by Rev. Dr. J. M. Sturtevant, Jr., and a closing chapter has been added. Its subject was for half a century one of the most eminent and useful men in Illinois and the neighboring West. He is one of the men who may be said to have acquired a national influence. As a preacher and an educator, and especially as a pioneer in education at the West, his services were invaluable. He was a distinguished Congregationalist during the latter portion of his life, and always previously in sympathy with Congregationalism, and his wide circle of remaining friends will enjoy this story of his career, and it will inspire many others to Christian and fruitful living. Dr. Sturtevant, Jr., has supplemented the autobiography proper happily, and the book doubtless will find a wide welcome.

A somewhat similar presenting of personal and editorial material is found in the autobiography and memoir of Charles Force Deems, D. D., LL. D. [F. H. Revell Co. $1 50], by Rev. E. M. Deems, Ph. D., and Dr. F. M. Deems, Ph. D. Dr. Deems was well known in educational circles, and as pastor during the later years of his life of the Church of the Strangers in New York city, which he himself gathered and built up. He was a somewhat conspicuous figure in Southern life before the war and in Northern circles since the war. He possessed a vivacious and energetic temperament, was a scholar and at the same time even more a man of affairs, served as a Methodist pastor and also as a college president, being actually the head of Greensboro College, North Carolina, and being invited in vain to the presidency of one or two other colleges, and was one of the founders of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy. He was a man of many friends, of fine spirit, considerable attainments and abounding activity, and his own account of his life, supplemented carefully by his sons, makes a readable and valuable volume.

A different sort of biography, but equally interesting, is the Sister Martyrs of Ku Cheng [F. H. Revell Co. $1.50], which contains a memoir and letters of Eleanor and Elizabeth Saunders, by Rev. D. N. Berry. These sisters were Australians by birth, who went as missionaries to China, and who had hardly begun their missionary services when they were murdered with other missionaries by Chinese marauders. The bland indifference to dates which characterizes many biographers renders it difficult to find out exactly when they did die, but it seems to have been about six months ago. The value of the two young ladies to the missionary service was of the slightest, simply because they had no opportunity to more than make a beginning, but their personal characters were lovely, their consecration was deep and their example most noble. This book is actuated too much by the intensity of friendly admiration, nevertheless it is a good piece of work and abundantly worthy of being read. Its strength lies in the vividness of the accounts of missionary life contained in the letters which they sent to their mother and other friends. They were bright girls, and their religion was an inspiration to all who knew them, and, humanly speaking, they deserved a better fate.

Rev. Dr. M. G. Cramer, ex-minister to Denmark and Switzerland, and a brother-in-law of General Grant, is the author of Ulysses S. Grant, Conversations and Unpublished Letters [Eaton & Mains. 90 cents]. Of course the author enjoyed opportunities for intimate, although apparently not frequent, conversations with General Grant and other members of his family, and this little book contains reminiscences, extracts from conversations, etc., from the point of view of a devoted relative. He bears the strongest testimony to the integrity and loftiness of General Grant's character and aims, and draws a telling picture of the general's patience under trial, freedom from the disposition to push his own interests, exalted patriotism and warm sympathy with the Christian religion. Without adding very much to the public knowledge of General Grant, it does contain some passages which are fresh, and it will intensify the popular respect and admiration for General Grant's character.

THE APRIL MAGAZINES

In the Bibliotheca Sacra Prof. G. F. Wright, in the Paradoxes of Science, establishes strikingly the fact that science cannot throw stones at religion on the ground of paradoxical statements, a truth which, as Professor Wright observes, at once clears the field of a great mass of current objections to Christianity. Prof. Henry Morton furnishes a paper on The Cosmogony of Genesis and Its Reconcilers; Prof. C. W. Super enforces ably the truth that there is no national stability without morality. A timely and interesting article is that by Dr. R. DeWitt Mallary in answer to the question Is the Recognition of the Church Year by All Christians Desirable? He takes the affirmative strongly. The Ideal of Church Music is discussed by Prof. Edward Dickinson, and Prof. J. M. P. Metcalf has a pleasant paper of special interest in its way on the Tell-el-Amarna Letters, the significance of which the world hardly has begun to appreciate. Mr. Z. S. Holbrook also supplies a vigorous review of Dr. Lyman Abbott's volume, Christianity and Social Problems. The Sociological and editorial departments are well filled and in breadth of range and strength of treatment the number certainly is equal to the best in its past history.

The Atlantic [$4.00] never was abler than at present. A third edition of the last issue was called for and this one should be no less popular. Dominant Forces in Western Life, by F. J. Turner; Mark Twain as an Interpreter of American Character, by C. M. Thompson; The Nominating System, by E. L. Godkin; Mercury in the Light of Recent Discoveries, by Percival Lowell; and A Century of Anglo-Saxon Expansion, by G. B. Adams, are the most serious. But half a dozen others in lighter vein are equally admirable in their respective ways. The place of the Contributors' Club is filled, and much more agreeably in our judgment, by bright papers from Bradford Torrey, Frances Courtenay Baylor and Mary Hartwell Catherwood grouped under the new title Men and Letters.

In Lippincott's Captain Charles King, U. S. A., is the author of the complete novel. Ray's Recruit is its name. Among the other contributors are Alice Morse Earle, whose topic is Matrimonial Divinations, Emily P. Weaver who gives A Glimpse of Old Philadelphia and F. P. Stearns who treats of Goethe in Practical Politics. It is a good number.——St. Nicholas [$3.00] offers its usual tempting variety of amusing and readable papers, bright pictures, etc., and such graver, although thoroughly entertaining, articles as Dr. Harold Wilson's Seeing and Believing, Lieut. J. M. Ellicott, U. S. N.'s, The Lights That Guide in the Night, about lighthouses, and F. W. Wendt on The Jungfrau Tunnel. It is admirable from cover to cover.

The Magazine of Art [Cassell Publishing Co. $3.50] has for its special subject—under the heading Our Rising Artists—Mr. George Harcourt and His Work. His portrait and examples of his skill are exceedingly interesting. Fashion in Art, by Fernand Khnopff, is discussed, with a striking illustration. The Royal School of Art Needlework, Emil Gallé and Art at Nancy, the Collection of Mr. W. C. Quilter, M. P., and a third paper dealing with the modern English masters are conspicuous features of this number. The Royal Academy elections are announced, and Notes and Queries and the Chronicle of Art are entertainingly and instructively supplied. Certainly the publication abundantly deserves its popularity.——The Cassell Family Magazine [$1.50] has a striking article called With a Camera in the Clouds, an account of a balloon voyage from Paris to Argen. The Poet Laureate at Home supplies pictures of the present English poet laureate and of his home and some account of his life. Various other interesting papers make up an admirable family magazine.——The Quiver [Cassell Publishing Co. $1.50] supplies stories, sketches, poetry and publications selected with a view to their fitness for Sunday use, as well as general reading, and this, too, is eminently interesting and commendable.

MISCELLANEOUS

A new volume is out in the Story of the Nation series. It is British India [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50], by R. W. Fraser. It is well studied and carefully written, not too long to be enjoyable, nor too much condensed to contain the substance of what common readers desire to learn. The main facts in regard to the rise of the East India Company, French efforts to gain a footing in India, the establishment of British supremacy and the maintenance and increase of British power, together with its result thus far, are all described with sufficient fullness and in an agreeable manner. Certain chapters, such as those on the relation of Afghanistan to India and on the famous Indian mutiny, are exceptionally interesting and the author's portrayal of the characters and histories of Lord Clive, Warren Hastings and others are impartial and able. It is something of a surprise to find so little in the book about Lord Canning, but the fact itself may be intentional and significant. The book is one which, although intended and adapted to be read, also may be reserved for use as a book of reference.

Prof. I. C. Russell in his work on Glaciers of North America [Ginn & Co. $1.90] offers what he modestly terms a reading lesson for students of geology and geography. He points out that the study of glaciers no longer need be, nor is, confined chiefly to those in Switzerland, and that North America supplies, in many respects, the best opportunity for such study yet made successfully available. His book is not only scientifically instructive, but contains much in the way of description and illustration which is of interest to a wide circle of readers untrained in science, although, of course, it is intended pre-eminently for scientists and is most fully to be appreciated by special students. But it abounds in material of general interest.

Messrs. Silver, Burdett & Co. have published Prof. H. A. Howe's Elements of Descriptive Astronomy. This is a text-book for students who have some knowledge of elementary algebra and plane geometry and who purpose to make themselves to some extent familiar with the kindred science of astronomy. Its illustrations, quite as much as the statements of the text, impress the reader with the great advances which have been made in astronomical study, and, technical though it be, no one can examine it without realizing what a fascination the study of astronomy comes to exert over those who master its rudiments sufficiently to be able to pursue it with some degree of ease.

NOTES

—— The Century Co offers a prize of $150 besides smaller ones for the best answers to a set of 150 questions dealing with a wide range of topics.

—— In the deaths of William T. Adams, "Oliver Optic," and Mrs. Margaret J. Preston, American authorship has lost two of its most widely-read representatives.

—— The New England Magazine has an interesting article upon its predecessor of the same name, which was started in 1831 but died at the end of the ninth volume. It was an important publication in its day.

—— The tasteful list of the publications of the Congregational Sunday School and Publishing Society—in which a number of portraits of authors are included, together with brief characterizations of its books and other information—is a new proof of the wisdom of the managers.

—— The Thursday Fine Arts Club of this city has given $200 to the Public Library to be used for the benefit of the Fine Arts Department. A good example. The money probably will be used in purchasing platinotype reproductions of works by Burne-Jones, Watts and Rossetti. The library also has received from the children of the late Dr. B. A. Gould, of Cambridge, some 700 volumes and over 3,000 pamphlets of a scientific character, largely relating to the Argentine Republic.

—— A great work on Oriental ceramic art, an exhaustive history of the subject, is in progress. Already seventeen years of labor have been expended upon it. The collection of Mr. W. F. Walters of New York, containing more than 4,000 specimens and doubtless the finest ever made, is used for illustration. Mr. Walters is supervising the work and the cost of preparing the edition of only 500 copies is expected to be $500,000. It will be in ten imperial folio volumes, the text being supplied by Dr. Bushnell and the notes and introduction by W. M. Laffan.

Gathering the Fruits at Berkeley Temple

Berkeley Temple is celebrating this week its seventieth anniversary, the evening of each day being set apart to some special topic or feature. On Sunday Dr. C. A. Dickinson preached an anniversary sermon recounting many interesting circumstances connected with the organization, which began as Pine Street Church and has passed through many striking experiences and several evolutions.

On Sunday afternoon a reunion communion service was held to which former members were invited, and in the distribution of the elements members of former boards of deacons participated with those now in active service. In the evening addresses were made by Rev. Messrs. A. E. Dunning, Morton Dexter, Lawrence Phelps, W. E. Barton and S. L. Loomis, and by Messrs. F. O. Whitney and S. B. Pratt. On Monday evening a Sunday school service was held.

An interesting service was held in the church as a part of the Sunday school quarterly review on the last Sunday in March. It was not impromptu in character. The teachers and superintendents began in the fall to plan and to labor for definite spiritual results. An atmosphere, created by the special evangelistic and temperance services during the first two months of this year, aided in accomplishing the ends sought. No apparent or direct results, however, seemed to come to the school from these services. Few of the pupils attended any of the special meetings.

The lessons for the quarter were the texts for earnest, personal application of the truths to the spiritual needs of the pupils. On the second Sunday of the year, when the lesson was upon the Holy Spirit's Descent, an expression was taken, by rising, of all who desired to have the Holy Spirit's power. A large number expressed such a desire. On Jan 31 a census was taken of each class in the four departments above the primary, including the ages from nine to twenty-one, and the adult department. Cards for each scholar were handed to the teachers, worded as follows:

> I accept Jesus Christ as my Saviour. I will confess Christ and will endeavor, so far as I can, to live a Christian life.
> Church Member. { Yes.
> No.

Upwards of 100 were signed and returned with the word yes or no erased. Fifty cards were signed by non-church members. Upon each succeeding Sunday during February and March one or more cards have been signed as the result of a conference with parent or teacher, or a longer consideration of what it meant.

The teachers followed up the work by calling, by prayer and by personal conversation until the last Sunday of March, when a second step was taken to test the strength of purpose of the young converts.

After three-quarters of an hour of opening and class services the entire school assembled in the large vestry. The sub-primary and primary departments occupied fifteen minutes with song and blackboard review, and then the lessons for the quarter were briefly summarized by the superintendent. The superintendent of each department, in turn, was asked if any were ready to confess Christ before the school to invite such to stand in front of the platform. Then followed a moment of quiet but noble action, when from the senior department more than twenty young men and women stepped forward, accompanied by their teachers. Then from each of the intermediate and junior departments twenty-five or thirty also came forward, accompanied by their teachers. It was an impressive sight to see such a company of youth stand, completely surrounding, several rows deep, the large platform, upon which were seated the primary departments and the pastor, Dr. Dickinson, Miss Nellie G. Jerome, State superintendent of Junior C. E., and Mr. W. N. Hartshorn, chairman of the S. S. State executive committee. The superintendent addressed a few words of greeting, exhortation and advice, the company repeating the above confession. The pastor, deeply moved by the unusual sight, with difficulty expressed his appreciation of the work of the teachers and his joy at the results. That this was only a second and definite step in their voluntary decision to confess Christ and endeavor to live a Christian life, as well as the importance of becoming members of the church as soon as such a step commended itself to the good judgment of parents and teachers, was plainly stated. Miss Jerome addressed a few words to the Juniors and Mr. Hartshorn led in prayer. All joined in singing "Nearer, my God, to thee" as the seventy returned to their classes.

The Park Street Council

Contrary to our usual custom we print below the resolutions of the council last week Thursday, which declared the pastoral relations between Rev. I. J. Lansing and Park Street Church dissolved. We do this to prevent misapprehension. The statement in the Transcript, for example, that the council omitted the usual recommendation of the retiring pastor is misleading and is likely to do injustice to Mr. Lansing. The council said as much to recommend the minister to the churches as to recommend the church to the ministers. The council recognized the fact that the church had been disturbed and hindered in its work by serious internal differences extending over a considerable time. The council was not officially informed of the history of these differences, and did not feel called on to discuss at length or pass judgment on them. Its result was drawn up with the purpose of stating only facts on which all could agree, and thus securing as near an approach to unanimity as possible. Its statement distinctly affirmed its confidence in Mr. Lansing's Christian character and soundness in the faith held by Congregational churches. His standing in the ministry is not affected by the result. The mind of the council was to recognize recent disturbances in the church only so far as to regard them as past and to wish both church and pastor prosperity in their future service in the kingdom of Christ. The resolutions read as follows:

> The council, having listened to the records of Park Street Church and Society concerning the resignation of the pastor, Rev. Isaac J. Lansing, under date of March 10, 1897, and the action of the church at the meeting March 16, and of the society March 18 accepting the same and providing for a mutual council to dissolve the pastoral relations, approves the action of the church and society and hereby declares the pastoral relation dissolved.
> We testify concerning the pastor, Rev. Isaac J. Lansing, that he is an able preacher, a forceful and effective speaker, an industrious student, sound in faith and of unquestioned Christian character.
>
> We tender our good wishes to this church, with its noble history, its excellent equipment and location, praying for its prosperity and peace. We trust that its members will stand together in united and faithful service, and that they may soon have the guidance of another pastor whom we shall heartily welcome to our Christian fellowship.
>
> We pray that pastor and people may forget those things which are behind and seek for those things which are before in such ministry and service as will best promote the interest of the kingdom of Christ on earth.

The Boston Seamen's Friend Society

The longest chaplaincy of the Seamen's Friend Society is that of the present incumbent, Rev. S. S. Nickerson, the fifteenth anniversary of whose entrance upon that office was fitly celebrated last week Thursday evening at the seamen's rooms on Hanover Street. After a reception refreshments were served, and following a program of interesting exercises was enjoyed. About 300 members of our city churches and many sailors were present, besides over 100 members of other churches in the vicinity. The young women gave excellent service, and the women's auxiliary rendered valuable assistance. Its president, Mrs. F. O. White, conducted the devotional services. Dr. Alexander McKenzie gave an address on The Outlook, and Mr. A. H. Hardy, son of Mr. and Mrs. Alpheus Hardy, whose interest and efforts have strongly supported the society, gave a reminiscent address of the organization from its beginning to the present time. Thereafter Captain Nickerson was presented with an onyx clock, and he received many congratulations on the success of his labors. Choral selections were a pleasing part of the service.

The Seamen's Friend Society was founded in 1827, and has had in all eight chaplains. During the last decade and a half the total attendance at the rooms has been nearly 500,000, of whom 200,000 were sailors. The requests for prayer made during this time were more than 7,000, and 3,669 sailors have signed the pledge.

Dean Hodges of Cambridge on Socialism

For nearly an hour on Monday the Boston ministers gave close attention to the witty, eloquent and wise address of Dean Hodges on Christian Socialism. That they appreciated it was proved by the bursts of applause which punctuated it, and the hearty thanks voted him at the close of the meeting. He began by a little description of the career of Mr. Houghton of the Park Street publishing firm, saying that he was a business man with idealistic tendencies, and he emphasized the fact that these tendencies were essential to a pastor, who should see in his parish not a field for labor but a force to be used in furthering the kingdom of God. He must see in every city slum, behind the doors of the tenement houses, as great possibilities as were behind the closed senses of Hellen Keller a few years ago, who now is about entering Radcliffe College. The great tragedy of city life is the waste of talents and material in the people submerged in poverty and ignorance. There are two groups who work for the betterment of mankind—the individualists, who believe that only by one helping one can the problem be solved, and the socialists, who believe that by legislation and changed conditions all evils will be done away. Dr. Hodges said that these forces were interdependent, and that just as in walking one stands on one foot and then on the other, so the world has advanced by both these methods, and having stood on the individualistic foot since the days when the invention of powder and printing made the poor and ignorant able to compete with the well-to-do and educated, so now it is getting ready to put forward the socialistic foot, and whether we like it or not socialism is coming.

Un-Christian socialists claim that by better laws, higher wages, better houses, etc., social conditions can be improved, but Christian socialism, while admitting the need of all these things, asserts that they can be made effective only by the co-operative spirit which is fostered by the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ. Dr. Hodges then described the condition of the poor in England fifty years ago and the efforts of Maurice, Kingsley and Hughes to arouse the conscience of the English people. They were prophets teaching an idea, which we are still learning. It means first the need of a better knowledge, and then the need of a better spirit. The Levite in the parable had knowledge. He went and looked at the wounded man, probably asked him the regulation socialistic questions, his name, number of his children, time he was hurt, number of robbers, etc., "and when he had filled out his beautifully prepared blank he went on to Jericho to report the case to the Associated Charities." He had knowledge enough but he needed the right spirit. We must approach the men we would uplift in the spirit Christ had in mind when he said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it or done it not unto one of the least of these ye have done it or done it not unto me."

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS

We trust that that Western community which, after a long period of discord, has become sufficiently harmonious to hold union meetings, will hereafter dwell together as brethren in unity.

The pastor who cares for that field in the Sunflower State which is 78 miles long and comprises nine preaching stations must be a veritable circuit rider. We hope he has a bicycle.

The brother who traveled forty-five miles through Kansas mud to attend an association meeting must have had a strong sense of either duty or privilege—perhaps both.

Evidence of increasing cordiality between the Episcopal and Congregational denominations comes from various sources, notably Minnesota and Illinois.

From such an immense undertaking as is contemplated by a Hartford church as to its church building great advantages must be expected to accrue.

Each revival season emphasizes the fact that the more thorough and earnest the preparation the more blessed the results.

More reports of successful joint revival efforts this week add testimony to the benefits resulting from such plans.

A California pastor has hit upon a bright plan for ascertaining what subjects are sure to interest his people.

The benefits of a New Jersey church extend in other directions beside the spiritual.

Golden anniversaries have been frequent of late.

Of Special Note

An earnest civic movement in a New England prohibition State.

Thousands reached by gospel wagon work in an Eastern city.

Three prospective churches in Minnesota.

Good reasons for hope in an Ohio church.

A MAINE SEMI-CENTENNIAL

On a golden day the golden anniversary of the Central Church, the youngest of the three in Bangor, was celebrated. The meeting house was profuse in floral decorations. In the afternoon an expectant congregation gathered to hear a historical address of the beloved former pastor, Rev. G. W. Field, D. D. After introductory exercises the pastor, Rev. J. L. Penman, spoke of many letters received, and read that of Dr. Samuel Harris of Yale Divinity School. Then in his reminiscences Dr Field said the church had its inception in the warm hearts and strong wills of Professor Shepard and Deacon E. Adams. The motive in the organization was distinctively missionary, to attract the humbler classes and non-church-goers, services being at first held in a hall. In 1853, the present edifice was dedicated. The early growth of the church was continuous and healthy, and the ideals held up in the beginning were carried out in the conduct of the Sunday school, the efforts to do city missionary work and the support of foreign missionary work. Dr. Field paid tributes to former pastors and members. He also alluded to the changes in theological belief, and welcomed the return to the simple Christianity of the New Testament. In the evening the lecture rooms were decorated and thrown open for a reception to the members of the church, and also the pastors and officers of the city churches generally, the seminary faculty and many former members of the church. Orchestral music and refreshments were pleasing features.

W. F. Shepard, M.D., in behalf of his sisters, brothers and himself, presented the church with a fine portrait of his father, Dr. George Shepard, nearly life-size and elegantly framed. He also gave some interesting personal reminiscences of his father. Professor Sewall responded in behalf of the church.

A MICHIGAN SEMI-CENTENNIAL

The celebration of the first half-century of the Ann Arbor Church will long be remembered by those who shared in it. The church owes its beginning largely to the anti-slavery sentiment of its founders, who 50 years ago determined to leave the Presbyterian church of the city, whose pastor then was a man of Southern birth and sympathies. But the relations of the two churches have always been friendly and the present Presbyterian pastor responded on behalf of the other churches at the anniversary supper.

Greetings from the neighboring churches were given by Dr. H. P. DeForest of Detroit, who recalled how much Congregationalism owes to Rev. L. S. Hobart, the first pastor of this church. President Angell, who presided in his customary felicitous manner, called out Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, and read letters from former pastors. Saints and heroes of the church were canonized, none more so than Deacon Lorrin Mills. Prof. W. H. Ryder of Andover, pastor here for 11 years, preached Sunday before a crowded house.

The Sunday school, organized the same day as the church, observed its semi-centennial by appropriate services, a brief address being given by one of the two superintendents who have guided its affairs for 40 years. In the afternoon the church communed around the Lord's table and enjoyed memories of those who have gone before. In the evening, before a congregation that filled the house, the present pastor, Rev. J. W. Bradshaw, D.D., who is about to enter upon the 10th year of his successful ministry, gave an inspiring historical survey of all the various departments. Of the original 42 members three were present at the celebration. The church has grown to a membership of over 400. To the patience and devotion of Rev. H. L. Hubbell, D. D., in 1867 was largely due the building of the new and beautiful house of worship. Before his coming the life of the church had several times been in the balance through adverse circumstances and rapidly changing pastorates, but during the past 25 years the church has enjoyed continued prosperity, with a united membership.

SPRING ASSOCIATIONS IN THE SUNFLOWER STATE

The meetings already held in Kansas have been occasions of rare interest and spiritual inspiration. Heroic devotion to the Lord's work, warm fellowship, missionary enthusiasm and a consciousness of abounding Christ-life in the hearts of delegates and ministers have been the leading characteristics. One delegate drove forty-five miles over muddy roads to attend. The preaching, the fraternal conferences on home missions, the addresses on missions, Sunday schools and education, the soul-stirring reports from the fields and the plans for still more giving and serving by these frontier churches quickened joy and faith in every worker's heart.

At Wichita Association in Arkansas City the opening sermon on Consecration, the discussion of The Place that Christian Missions Should Hold in the Twentieth Century, the report from Fairmount College, a deeply interesting woman's hour and the singing of students in the Chilocco Indian School, with a telling address in behalf of his race by Mr. Dagnette, in whose veins Indian blood flows, were impressive features.

At Great Bend the Arkansas Valley Association received a hearty welcome by the church which in 1893 entertained the General Association. The occasion was rich in intellectual and spiritual enjoyment. Early Recollections and The Vacant Pulpit Between Pastorates were among the themes.

Eastern Association at Olathe considered How Can We Further the Interest of Foreign Missions, Ideal Service of Ministers and Laymen and The Duties of the Christian Citizen.

Central Association at Chapman opened with a timely paper on What Is the Bible? and a sermon by Rev. J. E. Kirkpatrick. Preparation of Children in the Sunday Schools for Church Membership was the ably handled theme of Supt. W. L. Sutherland, and Miss Maddocks, dean of the Woman's Department of Washburn College, spoke effectively on The Christian College as a Missionary Force. The farewell prayer and testimony meeting showed how great a spiritual uplift the meeting had brought to many hearts.

Southern Association met at Severy. The opening sermon, by Rev. W. H. Walker, gave the welcome spiritual keynote for the session. Southern Kansas Academy, Washburn College and Giving were prominent themes. Hon. Warren Finney read an able essay on Congregational Limitations of Liberalism in Theology, taking the position that adherence to the fundamental principles of Christian truth and faith is essential to genuine Congregationalism.

Previous to the regular program of the Superintendents' Union last Monday night, the members had the pleasure of greeting and hearing briefly from Rev. G. R. Merrill, D. D., of Minneapolis, who preached at Park Street Church Sunday. Thereafter a consideration of Successful Methods of Stimulating Bible Study was taken up. The speakers were Messrs. E. W. Branch and M. F. Davis, who outlined respectively the training school for Christian service of Bethany Church, Quincy, and the normal class of Phillips Church, South Boston. Both organizations are in large, active churches, and have attained marked success.

East Boston.—Maverick is a free church, sustained by the free gifts of those who attend. Last Sunday was the beginning of the financial year, and pledges enough were received to meet the current expenses of the coming year, which is the best showing for 20 years. In connection with the fact that during the past 16 months 63 families of the congregation have left East Boston, and during the past year 58 members have moved out of town, the outlook was quite a surprise to the church itself. Dr. Smith Baker is pastor.

Mt. Vernon heard with much pleasure last Sunday evening Mrs. Ballington Booth upon her work in prisons. She had spoken earlier in the day to the convicts in the State Prison at Charlestown.

Allston. Another slum worker, Miss Meredith Brown of London, who has been heard at Bethany Chapel, Brookline, and elsewhere in this vicinity lately, spoke for Rev. J. O. Haarvig last Sunday evening.

Old South. Last Monday night the Old South Club observed "the red letter night," the ladies sharing in a pleasing evening. Dr. and Mrs. G. A. Gordon and Mr. J. D. Ball, the president, received. The address was given by Mr. A. L. Hatheway on The English Drama in the Age of Elizabeth. The Old South Glee Club sang and there were also instrumental selections.

Massachusetts

Brookline.—Harvard is making its new organ please and educate a wider circle of persons than even its own large congregations embrace by giving a series of four Saturday afternoon recitals. They are largely attended. Dr. Thomas preached last Sunday evening on the Turkish question.——Leyden. The subjects of Rev. H. G. Hale's current Sunday evening lectures are: April 11, The Mythology, the Fiction and the Poetry of the Old Testament; April 18, The Histories and Law Books of the Old Testament; April 25, The Prophecies of the Old Testament; May 2, The Histories and Epistles of the New Testament.

Cambridge.—First. Dr. McKenzie has so far recovered from his accident as to be able to occupy his pulpit and to resume his other duties, which have practically suffered but little break.

Somerville.—Franklin Street, without a pastor for over two years, will now enter upon a new period with Rev. R. W. Wallace of Newport, R. I., whose acceptance of the pastorate was read last Sunday after he had preached the sermon. Active work will be at once taken up.

West Somerville.—Day Street unites during April 11–16 in revival services with the Third Universalist Church, services being held in both meeting houses. The preachers are to be Rev. Messrs. G. W. Bicknell, D. D., Alexander McKenzie, D. D., C. E. Foster, F. O. Hall, R. A. Vose and Peter McQueen.

Melrose.—First recently called Rev. Thomas Sims of Toronto, Ont., and last Sunday his acceptance was read. The engagement is for three years, beginning the first of May.

Newburyport.—Belleville. The many friends of Rev. Dr. D. T. Fiske, senior pastor, will regret to learn that he has been seriously ill with the grip and bronchitis, with threats of pneumonia. His 78th birthday was March 29. Mrs. Fiske also is ill with the grip.——The third anniversary of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip was celebrated the evening of April 1 with a largely attended social. A delightful address was given by Rev. G. A. Hall of Peabody.

Middleboro.—Central is observing its 50th anniversary this week, beginning Sunday, when large numbers were present at the exercises. The pastor, Rev. R. G. Woodbridge, gave a historical address. The church began with 32 members. Since then 712 persons have been received, and the present membership is 339. The church is free, and derives its support from voluntary offerings. A service largely of song was held Sunday evening, the pastor speaking briefly. The program for the week includes the annual roll-call, a banquet, with addresses, and on one day addresses on local topics and reminiscences.

Palmer.—Second. The semi-centennial was celebrated, April 1, with exercises afternoon and evening. The address of welcome was by Rev. F. E.

Jenkins, the pastor, and Rev. G. M. Gerrish of Thorndike gave the greeting from the mother church. Rev. F. S. Hatch of Monson spoke for the churches in fellowship. A historical address was given by O. P. Allen. The first pastor, Rev. Thomas Wilson of Waterville, N. Y., gave an address. All the former pastors were present except one. A letter of greeting from Rev. Pleasant Hunter, D. D., was read. Rev. B. M. Fullerton, D. D., spoke on The Pastor's Burdens and Joys, and Rev. Lyman Whiting, D. D., contrasted the pastorate of 50 years ago with the present. The Layman at Work was the theme of Rev. Dr. H. W. Pope.

North Wilbraham.—The pastor, Rev. H. B. Mason, was ill for six months previous to March 1, and plans for work in the church were seriously interfered with. But the attendance and membership of the Sunday school has increased, and the Sunday evening service is in charge of the Y. P. S. C. E. The benevolences last year amounted to $235.

North Brookfield.—Under the guidance of the pastor, Rev. J. L. Sewall, the Young Men's Club has been studying civil government, and recently visited the legislature and a number of public buildings in Boston. The district representative has taken interest in the idea, and has lectured before the club. A mock town meeting, on a recent date, was a special event of much instruction.

Ludlow.—Union. Rev. A. J. Quick has resigned after six years of labor here. The church has grown during this time, and the labors of his wife have been felt, especially in the Sunday school.

Northampton.—Edwards. The contract for the new organ, to cost $6,400, has been awarded to George S. Hutchings of Boston.

Dalton.—The Y. P. S. C. E. has added to the chapel collection another picture of a former pastor, Rev. William R. Terrett, D. D., now professor in Hamilton College. Cottage prayer meetings are being held. The pastor, Rev. G. W. Andrews, has been giving a series of lectures Sunday evenings on The Johns of History. The pastor's project, a workshop for the boys, has been carried out and a room below the dining-room of the chapel is utilized. The S. S. home department has contributed $20 to the Seaman's Friend Society for a loan library. The congregation has pledged $100 for the support of a general missionary in Berkshire County. The benevolences of the church last year were $4,486.

Maine

Ellsworth Falls.—Since last summer a special effort has been made to secure a new building. A mass meeting resulted in raising $1,600, besides the $500 already in hand. In November the new house was started, and this spring it is finished. The cost, including furnishings, will be $5,000. The location is central, the house has lecture-room and auditorium, the latter being 34 by 34 1-2 feet and finished in hard pine. The windows are of stained glass. Rev. E. L. Hunt is pastor, to whom much of the recent success is due.

Waterville.—The Christian Civic League of Maine was formed with enthusiasm March 29, and 35 cities, towns and plantations from 16 counties were represented. A permanent organization was formed with Principal G C. Purinton of Farmington president. The address of the evening was by President Hyde. Rev. J. G. Merrill and others also spoke.

Thomaston.—Union meetings began the last week in February, Evangelist Gale and Rev. T. P. Williams assisting in leading and singing. The largest hall in the place has been filled and much attention has been aroused. Many cards have been signed and the meetings continue.

Auburn.—High Street, for the first time in 20 years, is entirely out of debt and has assets valued at about $400 outstanding. This condition is largely due to the success of the weekly envelope system.

At the semi annual meeting of the trustees of the Maine Missionary Society it was voted that $1,000 be the limit of the amount to be expended upon the summer (or student) work among the churches. This is less than a third of the amount usually expended. The work of the lady missionaries was highly commended in a resolution adopted.——The Year-Book statistics are being distributed to the churches.——Rev. C. S. Holton has finished work at Eastport after a five years' period.——Mr. G. H. Woodard of Bangor Seminary will supply at Princeton on alternate Sundays for a time.——South Paris recently had a good meeting on the Maine Missionary Society, with Rev. W. G. Puddefoot, Secretary Hatch and others as speakers.

New Hampshire

Concord.—South's new year-book, just issued, shows for 1896 total benevolent contributions of $2,727. Current expenses were $6,587, and the cost of chapel and furnishings was $14,615. Twenty-nine new members were received to the church, 10 on confession, a net gain of nine, making the total 462. On Children's Sunday Bibles were given to 19 who had previously been baptized.——First. The formal resignation of Dr. F. D. Ayer was read from the pulpit March 28, to take effect Sept. 12.

Vermont

Waterbury.—Mr. G. E. Ladd, recently called as pastor, is a native of Woodstock, a graduate of Williams College and is now completing theological study at Yale Divinity School. After his college course he taught three years in Robert College and is a son-in-law of the founder of that institution, Dr. Cyrus Hamlin.

Rhode Island

Providence.—Free Evangelical. Old Colony Days was the name of a Pilgrim festival much enjoyed for two evenings. Historic tableaux, colonial curios and a Pilgrim kitchen made up the entertainment.——Plymouth. Rev. S. H. Woodrow lectured upon The New Woman for the benefit of the Endeavor Society of the church last week.

Connecticut

Hartford.—Pearl Street is planning to remove its edifice to Farmington Avenue. A canvass is in progress in regard to the matter. The building is constructed of Portland brownstone, with a spire 212 feet high made entirely of stone. It is proposed to take the building down, mark each stone, and rebuild about a mile and a half west of the present site, which it has occupied since 1851. The cost of removal is estimated at about $35,000. The new location is near the Asylum Hill meeting house which is over-crowded and unable to accommodate all the Congregationalists on the hill.——Fourth. The church has secured the services of Evangelist L. B. Greenwood to labor for a week or more beginning April 19. Evangelist H. J. Gillette of this church made 2,376 calls and received 1,711 office calls last year. He conducted 415 religious services, besides a great deal of other missionary effort and found work for 58 persons. The repairs and enlargement of the edifice and chapel will cost about $15,000. Nearly $11,000 had been subscribed for the new house and permission will be obtained to use this amount. The church had quite a shortage during the year.

Naugatuck Valley.—An unusual revival spirit has prevailed throughout this valley. At Torrington two seasons of evangelistic services were held with gratifying results. At Woodbury also a special series of meetings did much good. The Swedish Congregationalists in Naugatuck have held revival meetings, the local pastor being assisted by other clergymen of his nationality.

Torrington.—A recent revival has been the most fruitful of any for years past. Large accessions are expected in addition to the number who have already joined the church this year.——French has effected its organization and officers and deacons were elected. The report of the treasurer shows a balance of $50 on hand with all debts paid.

Greenfield Hill.—At a special meeting to consider the organ question, it was voted to provide the balance necessary, $400, by subscription, and canvassers were appointed. Mrs. Bartram has provided for eight stained glass windows to be placed in the meeting house. Others will be put in by the parish.

Putnam.—A balance of $140 remains in the treasury, notwithstanding repairs and improvements, the putting in of memorial widows, and the expense incidental to the pastor'a three months' absence. Last year was the most prosperous of the society. Rev. F. D. Sargent is the pastor.

Waterbury.—First. A large Men's Guild has been formed with the editor of the leading paper as president.——Second at its last communion numbered over 1,000 members, making it the largest in the State and placing it among the first few in New England.

New London.—The late Mrs. B. P. McEwen left to the C. H. M. S. $8,000, the Woman's Board $2,000, the A. M. A. $1,000 and after a number of personal bequests and $1,000 left to the Memorial Hospital the residue goes to the American Board.

South Manchester.—The Sunday school in the Bunce district has outgrown its present quarters. Another room will now be secured. A cash donation from the First Church at West Hartford has been received and was greatly appreciated.

Winsted is just now enjoying rather unusual activity in church building and improvement.——First is adding largely to its building fund now well advanced.——Second is raising money for repairs to the extent of $10,000 or more.

Greenwich.—The receipts of a recent novel entertainment, $160, will be used in improvements on the chapel. Rev. Dr. R. T. Hall has been enjoying a two weeks' vacation in Florida, part of the time conducting the Chautauqua.

Meriden.—First. Of nearly 200 S. S. scholars who took the first examination on the last quarter's lessons, all showed great proficiency. The use of Testaments instead of quarterlies is producing favorable results.

Huntington, at a recent meeting, voted to use the legacy left by Miss Lucinda Gould to pay the church debt of $250, build a kitchen in the basement, paint the parsonage and make other similar improvements.

New Haven.—Humphrey Street. Rev. and Mrs. F. R. Luckey, now in Florida recuperating from an attack of the grip, will be home in time for Easter. The assistant pastor, Rev. E. P. Armstrong, supplies the pulpit.

Weatogue.—The loss of the chapel is serious, since there is no suitable place for holding the meetings. A residence is now used and a new chapel will probably soon be erected.

The church at Watertown has been incorporated.——Southbury loses one of its most influential members in the death of Deacon Sherman Tuttle, aged 84.——Harwinton has just lost its oldest member by death at the age of 93.——The spire of North Church, Bridgeport, has been declared unsafe and will be rebuilt.——Rev. W. H. Phipps of Prospect has been confined to the house with the prevailing malady.——Rev. John De Peu has preached his farewell sermon at Norfolk and moved to his new charge at Bridgeport.——Cheshire has voted for the free pew system another year.——Derby Endeavorers have contributed over $25 for the Armenians.

MIDDLE STATES

New York

Olean is about to lose its pastor, Rev. J. H. McKee, who started the enterprise in 1888. During his ministry 130 members have been received, 76 on confession. A fine edifice in a central location, with parsonage adjoining, have been secured. The church is thoroughly organized for work, is at present in a specially promising condition, and, while its people are of moderate means, they have contributed generously towards local work, remembering at the same time the regions beyond. The church has the reputation of being the most spiritual in the place, and has attended to temperance and educational work. The pastor has held since 1891 the position of regents examiner of schools, is president of the County Bible Society and a prominent officer in two organizations for scientific research. He is much beloved by his people, and leaves because of the heavy strain of new work.

Gloversville.—On the evening of the last Sunday of March a memorial service was held in honor of the first pastor, Rev. H. N. Dunning, who died the previous day. He was pastor from 1852 to 1864, and may be said to have laid the foundation for the church's subsequent work. His influence as an educator was also marked. The present pastor, Rev. W. E. Park, preached a sermon in memory of his predecessor, characterizing him as an exhaustive reader, a careful translator, a poet and an able linguist.

Buffalo.—Fitch Memorial, under the lead of Rev. L. G. Rogers, has kept a reading-room open every night during the winter, with occasional entertainments and debates. The Lehigh Railroad shops are in the neighborhood, and the church uses these means to interest the men employed. Evangelist H. E. Gurney has been assisting in this field, also at Sloan. In this latter field a praiseworthy effort has been made to supply food and clothing to the poor.

Berkshire.—Rev. J. J. Hough concluded a pleasant 12 years' pastorate March 28. A feature of the closing service was the reception to the church of four young men on confession from one class in the Sunday school. Dr. Hough, who has been in broken health for some time, plans to take a year's rest with hope of regaining his health. The pulpit supply is arranged as stated last week.

Harford, which has sent forth some fine workers, has been without preaching for some time, and is now enjoying special services by Rev. Lemuel Jones of the H. M. S.

New Jersey

Jersey City.—First. The Men's Club displays increased activity and is growing. It provides for certain Sunday evening services, and the assistant pastor also gives stated stereopticon sermons. A new feature in the consolidated churches is a mutual benefit club. It pays $5 a week to sick members and a benefit of a dollar from each mem ber to the heirs of any who die. Candidates for admission to the club must be temperate, healthy and of good moral character, but need not be members of the church. Dues are 25 cents a month and there are no salaried officers. The new order is a feature in both branches of the church. Rev. L. F. Perry, assistant pastor in the First Church of Montclair, supplies the Tabernacle pulpit the fourth Sunday morning of each month.

Woodbridge.—Fifteen new members were added to the membership last month, 14 on confession. New stained glass windows, a gift to the church, have been put in the house of worship. Two are memorials to Mr. and Mrs. Ezra M. Brewster, who were among the founders and who died about a year ago. The pastor of late has been using the stereopticon with considerable success in the evening service. The pictures do not determine the discourse, nor are they named or described, but are chosen simply to bring out strongly certain points.

Haworth is not yet able to support a pastor, but it is earnestly carrying on the work of the church through its lay membership. Once in two months Rev. William Walton supplies the pulpit and administers the communion. Other Sunday mornings adult male members in turn read published sermons. An active Young People's Society has charge of the evening service. The Sunday school numbers about 40 and the home expenditures of the church amount to about $500.

East Orange.—The envelope contributions for the financial year just closed amounted to over $1,300, which sum is supplementary to the pew rentals. A $50 share in the A. M. A. Jubilee Fund has just been raised. The pastor, Rev. F. W. Baldwin, D.D., is about forming a class for the study of questions connected with church membership.

Westfield.—The last Sunday in March the last of a series of special musical services was given by a chorus and orchestra. Arrangements are made for five special Lenten services in Passion week, to be conducted chiefly by outside ministers.

Closter.—The pastor has instituted a series of evening meetings for young people. They are held at his house and are called "social literaries," combining entertainment and instruction.

THE SOUTH

Tennessee

Oakdale.—A new church was organized March 26, with 11 members. A sermon was preached and an after meeting held at which a number of those present asked prayers. A pastor is soon to be called.

THE INTERIOR

Ohio

Rockport, a near suburb of Cleveland, has had a successful year under the lead of Rev. C. W. Rice. At the close of the annual sermon Sunday morning, March 28, the large congregation remained for a special testimony meeting, and many members spoke. The Fulton plan of benevolence has been adopted. The new parsonage has enabled the church to have a resident pastor. Attendance at church and Sunday school has substantially increased, and an earnest revival brought a number of new members. The Endeavor and Ladies' Aid Societies are vigorous and active. A year ago the church was much disheartened, now there is a hopeful spirit.

Columbus.—Eastwood. Dr. J. C. Jackson comes to this church from the Methodist denomination where he has served as presiding elder and as pastor of some of the strongest churches in Central Ohio for the past 21 years. For fourteen years he has lived in Columbus, having been at two different times pastor of the same church, one of the strongest in the city. At the installation services an address of welcome was cordially made by the pastor of Broad Street Methodist Church, the leading church of its order.——First. Rev. Washington Gladden, D.D., defended in a recent sermon Dr. Lyman Abbott against criticisms made on him because of his sermons on the Bible. Dr. Gladden declared that Dr. Abbott had stated the positions generally held by Biblical scholars, and deserved the thanks of believers in the Bible for so doing.

[For Chicago news see page 486.]

Normal.—Rev. G. H. Burgess, who has been preaching here nearly three years, was recognized as pastor March 30. The council was called on account of certain rumors about the pastor's orthodoxy and gossip as to his habits. The examination indicated his thorough soundness and a rare thoughtfulness of mind. Charges as to habits affecting his usefulness were proved to be without good ground. The council therefore, in spite of a protest signed by representatives of seven families, felt itself warranted in publicly recognizing Mr. Burgess as a minister worthy of complete confidence. It felt, also, that since the grounds of opposition were wholly removed, the protestants would soon enter into hearty fellowship with those who had always believed in Mr. Burgess and enjoyed his ministry. The sermon was preached by Dr. E. F. Williams of Chicago.

Galesburg has just held a union service in which the Episcopal church joined, the rector preaching.

Indiana

Elkhart.—Union meetings have been in progress, led by Evangelist C. H. Yatman, churches in the center of the city of different denominations joining. Rev. F. E. Knopf, pastor of the First Church, has been elected a member of the School Board.——Riverside now has 44 members, and a Sunday school of 75. A hose house, loaned by the city, is used for services. A church building will be erected immediately. Rev. M. J. Duryea is pastor.

Fairmount's annual meeting showed a good degree of interest, nine having been added to the church, congregations having greatly improved during the pastorate of Rev. Levi White and a fine choir of 16 voices being organized. An effort to meet the diminished grant of the H. M. S. was undertaken April 1.

Michigan

Grand Rapids.—The Anti Saloon League of Michigan had a great day March 21. The pulpits were given up to the advocacy of the work, and it is fully expected that this day will bear good fruit in uniting parties and creeds in an effort to maintain law and order.

Calumet.—The Boys' Brigade observed its second anniversary March 26. Supper was served, and a company drill and music formed a pleasant entertainment.

Representatives of the State Y. P. S. C. E. have voted to raise among the societies $500 for the C. H. M. S. debt.

Wisconsin

Brodhead.—Evangelist J. R. Pratt has closed a successful series of union meetings at this place. Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational churches joined in the work. About 70 persons have declared their purpose to live Christian lives.

Eagle River celebrated its 10th anniversary April 2. Mrs. Todd, the pastor's wife, has been laid aside from active duty for several weeks on account of a fractured ankle.

THE WEST

Iowa

Primghar.—The retiring pastor, Rev. J. C. Stoddard, who has been with the church about six years, has seen the membership increase more than fourfold, a house of worship built and then rebuilt to double its seating capacity, and the church outgrow its need of H. M. aid.

Britt.—Rev. J. C. Stoddard, late of Primghar, begins his pastorate here with a series of revival meetings and an ingathering of 24 persons to membership.

Gaza, the youngest in the sisterhood of Iowa churches, recently received six persons on confession, making the membership 39.——In connection with recent revival meetings at Hampton, conducted by Evangelist Cordner, there were about 150 hopeful conversions.——Special meetings are now in progress at Oskaloosa under the leadership of Evangelist Hartsough.——Rev. H. H. Long has begun his third year of service at Bondurant and Linn Grove.

Spring

Those unsightly eruptions, Humors

painful boils, annoying pimples and other affections, which appear so generally at this season, make the use of that grand Spring Medicine, Hood's Sarsaparilla, a necessity.

The accumulated impurities in the blood cause very different symptoms with some people. The kidneys, liver and bowels are overmatched in their efforts to relieve the clogged system. Dizzy headaches, bilious attacks, failure of appetite, coated tongue, lame back, indigestion and that tired feeling are some results.

From the same cause may also come scrofula, neuralgia, sciatica or rheumatism.

All these troubles and more may properly be called "Spring Humors," and just as there is one cause, a cure is found in just one remedy, and that is Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Hood's Sarsaparilla purifies the impure blood, enriches blood which is weak and thin, vitalizes blood which lacks vitality. Thus it reaches every part of the system.

For your Spring Medicine—to prevent or cure Spring Humors, take

Hood's

Prepared only by C. I. Hood & Co., Lowell, Mass.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK

The events of the week have been somewhat more encouraging, although trade itself revives very slowly. Perhaps as hopeful a feature as any is the fact that in retail lines the demand is picking up. It is always a good indication when the retail business takes on more life, for it helps to clean the counters of supplies and opens the way to orders on jobbers and manufacturers.

There is no question that general trade is better than it has been. Men are better employed, and more money is in circulation as a result. There are no speculative or boom features to the improvement, which is decidedly fortunate. It is steady and gradual—so gradual, in fact, that men will not appreciate the full change from depression to prosperity. In the industries iron and steel continue low as to prices. The demand for these products is not up to expectations.

Cotton goods also remain quiet, but there are signs of a freer movement in these during the next succeeding weeks. The greatest activity continues in wool and woolens, and prices have scored another advance. In the leather and boot and shoe trades there is a very fair business doing. Prices are a trifle firmer, and good authorities claim that the Leather Trust must be making money.

In the stock market there is no particular feature. The late scare seems to have subsided, and people are gaining sufficient courage to hazard the opinion that everything is not going to the bad just yet. In the writer's judgment the late shaking down which securities have had furnishes an opportunity to buy stocks at prices which ought to show good profits before long. Boston finds it difficult to let copper stocks alone, and predictions are freely heard in brokers' offices that another upward movement in them is impending.

HERE is an opportunity for intelligent housewives to earn prizes by their wits—something more than "pin money." The Van Camp Packing Company of Indianapolis, Ind., the enterprising manufacturers of Van Camp's Boston Baked Pork and Beans (prepared with tomato sauce), have decided to offer $1,000 in 147 prizes for recipes which they accept for their new cook-book, describing methods for using their baked pork and beans either alone or in combination with other food products. The prizes are divided into one of $100, two of $50, four of $25, 140 of $5 each. The competition closes May 1, which gives ample time for thought and experiment. The awards will be announced July 1. Every recipe must be accompanied by a trade mark cut from a label of a can of Van Camp's Baked Pork and Beans. Their cook-book, Bean Cookery, will be mailed for the asking. Six cents will secure a sample can of pork and beans.

Minnesota

MINNEAPOLIS.—Lyndale. Work at the mission is developing, and over 20 persons are desirous of uniting in an organization which probably will be a branch of this church. Rev. M. A. Stevens is preaching there, and the work seems promising. ——New Brighton. Revival meetings have been held, Rev. C. W. Merrill of the Open Door Church assisting, and a number of persons have signified their purpose to begin a Christian life. The opening of the packing houses have brought several families, which give new strength to the little church.

WINTHROP.—At Cornish, an out station, meetings have been held by Rev. C. A. Ruddock, with the assistance of Evangelist Okerstein. A number of conversions resulted, and it is proposed to organize a branch church to be connected with Winthrop. Mr. Ruddock preaches at several out-stations and greatly needs an assistant.

WINONA.—The Southern Minnesota Ministerial Association met in Dr. L. L. West's study March 30 with full attendance. A paper by Rev. W. H. Medlar of Wabasha on Dr. Behrends's questionings and the host's exposition of The Social Message of Jesus called forth animated discussion.

AUSTIN, Rev. C. E. Wright, D. D., pastor, unites with other churches in meetings, beginning April 6, under the lead of Evangelist C. N. Hunt. He conducted a successful series here about four years ago, as a result of which over 100 members were received.

HIBBING.—Work is developing in this mining town under Mr. R. W. Watt of the Moody Institute, and the formation of a church in the near future is proposed. General Missionary Fellows is working at other points on the Iron Range.

Kansas

VALENCIA.—In 1893 this rural church in Shawnee County was organized with two preaching points, six miles apart. A building was erected at one of these points, which was called Plymouth. It was decided March 10 to organize a separate church at the latter station, to be known as Plymouth Church. The new organization started with 10 members and will probably have as many more soon. Meanwhile Valencia prospers, and both churches will continue to be served by the same pastor.

JETMORE.—Presbyterians and Methodists have joined Congregationalists in a series of meetings which has just closed. Union services have never before been held here, having been prevented hitherto by animosities. Several remarkable conversions occurred during these meetings, and the cottage prayer services, held daily, will be continued weekly throughout the year.

FORD AND FOWLER.—This field in southwestern Kansas is 78 miles long and comprises nine preaching stations, with a membership of 85, all in charge of one pastor. A deacon of Ford Church renders efficient help in conducting services at some of the stations. Twenty-seven conversions have occurred on the field in 10 months.

SEDGWICK has been enjoying a gracious revival, the meetings being conducted by the pastor, Rev. P. C. Burhans. During the three months ending March 1, 30 new members were received, and 10 more are soon to unite. The pastor also preaches at a country point.

Garnett is working unitedly and progressively, but is gathering funds to pay an indebtedness of $350 before engaging a pastor.——As a result of revival meetings, conducted by Rev. T. H. Gourley, in Twelve Mile church, 21 members have recently been received.

Nebraska

FREMONT.—Rev. W. H. Buss signified, March 28, his intention of terminating his relations with the church at a comparatively early day. The announcement caused much surprise and deep regret among his people. Mr. Buss has been the esteemed and efficient pastor here for nearly seven years, during which the church has made progress in all elements of true success. He has also been prominent in State work, being a director of the Nebraska H. M. S. Every effort will be made by his people to induce him to remain.

CAMBRIDGE.—Union meetings, which had aroused widespread interest in both churches and in the town, closed March 27. Twenty persons are already pledged to unite, most of them adults.

LEIGH, through heroic effort and sacrifice, last year maintained self-support, and March 21 made a generous contribution to the work of the C. H. M. S.

North Dakota

CARRINGTON.—A $1,000 parsonage has been built and paid for, except a loan from the C. C. B. S. Also about $250 have been expended in repairing the meeting house. The pastor's salary is promptly paid.

NIAGARA.—Rev. N. P. McQuarrie has been holding special meetings, which have awakened considerable interest. The reduced appropriation from the H. M. S. will seriously cripple the work.

PACIFIC COAST

California

SANTA ROSA.—Rev. L. D. Rathbone is preaching a Sunday evening series on Napoleon, Washington, Watt, Shakespeare and Newton. These characters were selected because in response to his inquiries the people gave them as their choice of the greatest heroes in war, statesmanship, invention, poetry and science.

PETALUMA.—A semi-annual meeting has just been held, with reports of all branches of work. Special encouragement was found in the Sunday school, which during the last half-year has doubled its membership and added a normal class.

LINCOLN.—The Methodists and Congregationalists have made arrangements for a series of bimonthly union Sunday services. The Epworth League and C. E. Society also join forces on these evenings.

LOS ANGELES.—West End has recently received two beautiful windows for its new edifice, now in process of construction. The church has decided to use individual communion cups.

OAKLAND.—First. The Busy People's Bible Class is to have three lectures by Prof. T. F. Bacon of the State University on The Bible, the Source of Religious Knowledge.

Supt. L. L. Wirt of the S. S. and Publishing Society is aiding Rev. J. A. Milligan in special services at Porterville in behalf of ranchmen.——During the

In many a household there is an empty chair that ought not to be empty. Hosts of children have been carried off by croup when there was no need for it at all. Croup comes along without any warning. Washington

ROSALIA has added to its membership several substantial people. The pastor, Rev. C. W. Campbell, has established an office, to which he has invited men for personal conversation, and a number of conversions have resulted. With the help of his young men he is now building a parsonage, where he will continue this personal work.

PLEASANT PRAIRIE dedicated a pretty and comfortable house of worship March 21, General Missionary Walters assisting. This is the third edifice which Rev. Jonathan Edwards has built on his large field within three years. All these have been dedicated free of debt.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, APRIL 2

Mrs. C. H. Daniels presided and, reading 1 Peter 1: 3, spoke of the "living hope" to which Peter frequently refers. Tokens of hope, the foliage and fruit of past service, appear in the great awakening noted in many mission stations—in the college and boarding school at Marsovan; in Marash, where some are making gifts to the church in memory of friends whom they have lost, and a brother in one of the out-stations prays, "We thank thee, O Christ, for taking our homes and giving us more of thyself"; in Harpoot and vicinity, Mr. Ellis, just before his death, having visited a little town where twenty-five were received to the church and sixty more were to come a little later; in the Shaowu field, 250 miles up the Chinese river Min, where hundreds of inquirers are reported; in Inanda, Esidumbini, Umvoti and other stations in the Zulu mission, where backsliders have been making confession and many have begun the new life. In view of all this the church at home is not coming up to its privileges and needs to be reminded of the promises of God.

Mrs. Schneider read extracts from a sheet of "News Notes" from Aintab, giving a review of the religious work in that city during the last fifteen months, reporting as one of the immediate results of the massacre and pillage of November, '95, a marked increase in church attendance, the difficulty of getting across the city and the fellowship of a common suffering having in the case of many obliterated denominational lines, so that Gregorians and Protestants have met together and a double service has frequently been held in the same church. Audiences on Sunday and during daily services for special seasons have run up into thousands and it has been a time of great spiritual uplifting and quickening. Mrs. Schneider also gave a few facts from Dr. Schneider's journal at Aintab published in the Missionary Herald for November, 1848, showing how small were the beginnings from which present results have grown. In this same Herald an editorial upon the financial condition of the Board and the necessity of liquidating the debt and the danger of retrograding if the Board only attempts to keep stationary has a familiar ring.

Tender allusion was made to Mrs. Edwin Bliss of Constantinople, whose burial in the Newton cemetery on the previous day had been attended by several of her co-workers in Turkey, all ready to testify to her lovely spirit and constant service. Miss Mary B. Daniels represented the Osaka station of the Japan mission, and making a comparison of missionaries' trials in Japan and Turkey drew a lesson of the need of more patience with uninteresting people. Reference was made to the missionaries in India whose names had appeared upon the calendar for the week, Miss Bruce of Satara being assigned to Friday. Mrs. Thompson, Miss Means and Mrs. Abell led the petitions which closed the interesting hour.

REV. CHARLES ELLIOTT HARWOOD

Mr. Harwood, pastor of the church at Cranberry Isles, Me., died at Orleans, Mass., March 30, aged fifty-five years. He graduated from Amherst in 1865 and from Andover in 1869, was ordained and installed at Orleans, Mass., in 1871, where he continued until 1881. He engaged in home mission work in Nebraska for some years, returning to Maine in 1890, having charge of the church at Presque Isle until 1892. At the time of his death he was settled over the church at Cranberry Isles, and was doing noble work.

REV. I. FAYETTE PETTIBONE, D. D.

Dr. Pettibone, one of the missionaries of the American Board, died at Rockton, Ill., March 21. He was born at Stockholm, N. Y., March 24, 1824, graduated from Union College in 1849 and Andover in 1854. He went to Turkey in the service of the Board in 1855, remaining there until the breaking out of the Civil War, when his sense of patriotism impelled him to come home and enlist. At the close of the war he returned again to the mission field, where he remained until 1893, when his health failing he returned to this country.

MRS. ELIZABETH HOLMES PORTER BLISS

Few women missionaries have become more widely beloved than Mrs. Bliss, who died at Amherst March 30. Her husband was the late Dr. E. E. Bliss, with whom she went to Turkey under the American Board in 1843. There, from Constantinople as a center, they made their influence felt far and wide, devoting themselves to all phases of missionary work with tact, fidelity and success. Dr. Bliss died in the harness in 1892, but Mrs. Bliss did not return to this country until last July, going directly to Amherst to make her home with her daughter, the widow of Langdon S. Ward, for so many years treasurer of the American Board. Two of Mrs. Bliss's daughters died in Turkey. Her son, Rev. W. D. P. Bliss, a graduate of Amherst in 1878, has been prominent as the rector of what was known for some time as The Church of the Carpenter, in Boston.

PRAYER MEETING

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN

Topic, April 18–24. Different Kinds of Death and the Conquest of Them. 1 Cor. 15: 50–58.

From the earliest times the thought of the world has been disposed to discriminate between the perishable and the imperishable part of a man. The fact of death for the body, sooner or later, has been recognized, sometimes after severe but fruitless opposition to it, sometimes with stoical indifference, sometimes with the calm resignation which faith in a loving Heavenly Father induces. But through all these different ways of looking at the death of the body has run a little silver thread of hope, developing with the Christian into a strong cable of assurance that the soul would survive.

Aside from the revelation of Christ we are not much better off than the ancients as respects our understanding of this great matter. It is true we can stave off death better than our fathers could. Modern medical science works wonderful cures. Better general conditions tend to a greater longevity. We are not wholly at the mercy of our foe, but when we stop to reflect we know that in due time we shall be obliged to yield to him. So perhaps we might as well make over to him in advance our bodies, this framework of tissues, muscles and nerves, caring for them, to be sure, as vigilantly as we may while they are yet ours, but prepared to surrender them when God deems best.

It is possible, however, practically to defeat death by cultivating within us the nature upon which he has no claim. If an abundance of hope, faith and love reside in our hearts, if heavenly aspirations and intuitions are cherished and exercised, if we allow ourselves to become partakers of the divine nature, then we are building up a force within us which can laugh at death. Have we not seen invalids, dying men and women, in whom the spiritual was so strong that it seemed as if death were only a gentle messenger sent to release a tremendous power from the grasp of a framework which fettered it? Think of Professor Drummond on his deathbed, singing with the sweet confidence of a simple Christian faith, "I'm not ashamed to own my Lord." It is inconceivable that so precious a thing as a Christlike character can be annihilated by the accident of death.

MRS. AUSTIN H. NORRIS

Mrs. Mary E. Norris, wife of the pastor of the Second Congregational Church of Torrington, Ct., was called home on the morning of March 25. Beginning her day's work as usual, long before its close she entered into rest. Her early home was in Northfield, Ct., where in 1874 she married Mr. Norris and went directly with him to missionary work in Michigan. The churches in Farwell, Clare, Ada, Richmond, Owego and Ithaca know what an effective assistant she was. When her husband became general superintendent of home missionary work in Michigan she continued her service in the church in Lansing, being especially active in Sunday school work. Thence the family removed to the historic parish of Torringford. Here young Mills was reared, who was one of the original band who knelt by the haystack to give themselves to foreign missions. Here was brought young Oobookiah, the Sandwich Island convert. It was fitting that Mrs. Norris should end her days amid such surroundings, for she was an enthusiast in both foreign and home missionary work, giving in toil and money most generously. She was also an earnest member of the W. C. T. U., and active in parish work. She was a bright, cheery woman, endowed with the gift of song, fully consecrated to the work of Christ. her Master She leaves, beside her husband, three children, one son and two daughters, all of whom are fitting for college.

HON. HENRY F. SANBORN

Mr. Sanborn of Epsom, N. H., died of heart disease at his late residence in Princeton, Mass., on Friday, March 26. He was born at Epsom on Feb. 26, 1819, and was a brother of Gen. John B. Sanborn of St. Paul, Minn., who together with two sisters, Mrs. J. G. Pearson and Mrs. H. D. Smith, survives him. In his earlier years he fitted himself for and spent two years at Dartmouth College, when the confinement of a student's life compelled him to abandon his professional career and return to the farm. He lived on Sanborn's Hill, on the farm which has descended from father to son in his family for 150 years, until in 1882 he sold it to his brother and sons and removed to Princeton, where he resided until his death.

A man of lofty character, sterling integrity and rare intellectual power, he commanded the respect and esteem of his fellow-citizens wherever he lived.

During his residence in Epsom he was repeatedly elected selectman of his native town, was chosen representative in 1855 and was twice elected to the Senate of the State of New Hampshire when that body consisted of but twelve men. In his later residence in Princeton he was chosen a member of the school board and has been for many years treasurer of the trustees of the Goodnow Memorial Building. In his earlier life he taught the old Center School in Epsom, and many a man traces to the inspiration of his presence and character the origin of his ambition and success. Nor did he fail to inspire the members of his own family with some of his worthy ambitions and marvelous energy. He leaves surviving him his beloved wife, Eunice Davis Sanborn, who has been his daily companion for more than fifty years, and their three children, Hon. Walter H. Sanborn of St Paul, Minn., United States circuit judge for the eighth judicial circuit, Hon. Edward P. Sanborn, a member of the city council of St. Paul and the law firm of John B. & E. P. Sanborn, and Mrs. Hattie A., the wife of Dr. William B. Cogswell of Stratford, Ct. Though not unmindful of the earthly honors which fell thickly upon him, his faith and hope through all the years of his active and useful life were in Christ and he died, as he lived, a faithful and trusting Christian.

HENRY CORNELIUS HAYDEN

Mr. Hayden died in Newtonville, Feb. 4. That place had been his residence for many years. His home was always a hospitable one, and as in his early manhood he was prosperous in business, he was able to gratify his generous impulses by often entertaining his friends and neighbors. He knew the art of being a host, because he genuinely enjoyed making others happy. He and his wife were original members of the Every Saturday Club, formed in 1870, and he was its first president. His literary tastes were cultivated and active, and he contributed much by his productions to the pleasure and profit of the club. A volume of his poems has been published, which is highly valued by those possessing it. These poems touch some of the deepest springs of human experience.

Mr. Hayden suffered severe business losses through the great fire in Boston in 1872, from which he did not recover. But in his struggles with adversity which followed, his patience, perseverance and Christian spirit won the admiration and devotion of his friends. In adversity, as in prosperity, his life was unselfish, and he was constantly devising means to lighten the burdens and brighten the lives of others.

Mr. Hayden's spiritual life characterized his sympathies and prompted him to Christian service of great value to the Congregational church, of which he was a member. He was for several years superintendent of the Sunday school and a deacon of the church. He was a willing and generous giver as long as he had means to give. His counsel and help were highly esteemed by the pastors with whom he served and by the congregation. The funeral services bore evidence of the esteem in which he and his family were held. Though the day was exceptionally unfavorable, a large audience assembled, and his pastor, Rev. J. M. Dutton, paid a tender and earnest tribute to his character and life as a Christian gentleman. The church and community have been blessed by having him so long among them, and they revere his memory.

The number of churches using individual communion cups is steadily growing larger. Inquiries concerning their use come to us every week from those who are considering the subject. We have yet to hear of a church which has adopted them going back to the use of the common cup. We believe it will not be many years before the common cup for all at the Lord's table will be as rare as its use at family tables.

A SINGLE LINE.—A great many helpful hints may be found in the advertisements of the Paine Furniture Co., which appear in this paper from week to week. A single illustration in their announcement in this issue will show better what we mean. In speaking of the 400 different styles of chiffoniers which they now have on exhibition, they very frankly say that it may take you forty-five minutes to examine so many different styles, but they add the wise injunction that it is a good investment of your time, since your comfort for a dozen years may depend upon the expenditure of these forty-five minutes today. This is sound, practical common sense.

The "Harris" Method of Giving

This little tract has been of immense service to the churches in suggesting systematic methods of giving. It was first published as an article in the Congregationalist, and attracted wide notice. SOUTH DAKOTA LEGISLATION

Strong interest has been felt in the biennial session of the legislature just closed. For the first time in the history of the State the Populist party had the governor and a safe working majority in both houses. For the first six weeks the absorbing topic was the senatorial controversy. The Populists were unable to agree upon Senator Kyle or an alternative candidate. Finally the Republicans threw their vote for Mr. Kyle, as the safest and most conservative Populist candidate, and effected an election. When chosen to the Senate six years ago Mr. Kyle was financial secretary of Yankton College, and earlier had filled several Congregational pastorates. In various sections of the State many men of many minds on political questions express confidence in his integrity of purpose.

Another question of absorbing interest has been the temperance legislation to take the place of the prohibition statute recently repealed by popular vote. The outcome is a stringent high license law giving local option to towns and cities. The annual license fee of $300 is equally divided between the county and State. The town cannot levy less than $200 and may levy $600 additional for local uses. Twenty-five voters in a town can secure the consideration of the question of license versus no license at any spring election. There are the usual provisions concerning sales to minors and drunkards, and Sunday closing; gaming is forbidden, also screens, tables and chairs. The strict enforcement of the restrictive features would no doubt abate the liquor evil in towns that have failed to enforce the prohibition law. A railway law was also passed, modeled on the lines of the Iowa statute. Passenger rates are reduced to three cents a mile and the railway commissioners are given power to fix reasonable freight rates. Hitherto the position of railway commissioner has been a sinecure involving little service.

The tremendous snowfall east of the Missouri River has cut off communication with the capital during most of the session. The train which brought the legislature away from Pierre at times passed between snowdrifts on either side of the track fully four feet above the tops of the cars. H. K. W.

PREGNANT SENTENCES FROM HENRY DRUMMOND

Christ's yoke is simply his secret for the alleviation of human life, his prescription for the best and happiest method of living.

The whole difference between the Christian and the moralist lies here. The Christian works from the center, the moralist from the circumference.

The Spirit of God which brooded upon the waters thousands of years ago is busy now creating men, within these commonplace lives of ours, in the image of God.

As we must spend time in cultivating our earthly friendships if we are to have their blessings, so we must spend time in cultivating the fellowship and companionship of Christ.

Many men would be religious if they knew where to begin; many would be more religious if they were sure where it would end. It is not indifference that keeps some men from God, but ignorance.

As the supernatural becomes slowly natural, will also the natural become slowly supernatural, until in the impersonal authority of law men everywhere recognize the authority of God.

If science is to begin to recognize religion, religion must at least end by recognizing science. . . . No man, no man of science even, observing the simple facts, can ever rob religion of its due. Religion has done more for the development of altruism in a few centuries than all the millenniums of geological time.

The visible is the ladder up to the invisible; the temporal is but the scaffolding of the eternal. Then when the last immaterial souls have climbed through this material to God, the scaffolding shall be taken down, and the earth dissolved with fervent heat, not because it was base, but because its work was done.

The amount of spiritual longing in the world—in the hearts of unnumbered thousands of men and women in whom we should never suspect it, among the wise and thoughtful, among the young and gay who seldom assuage and never betray their thirst—this is one of the most wonderful and touching parts of life.

NEAL DOW AS A READER OF THE BIBLE

When the veteran temperance reformer was a boy he presented his father with a copy of "Collins stereotype edition" of the Bible, published in 1824. After his father's death, in 1860, this sacred volume became his inheritance. For twenty-five years and more he has read it with systematic fidelity. Three chapters a day is his custom, unless interrupted by travel and lecturing. At the close of each book is written in ink the date when its reading was completed. At the time of his ninety-third birthday, March 20, he was reading Nehemiah. He began the record here in 1878.

Twelve times in the past nineteen years has the renowned prohibitionist read through the entire Bible, including the Apocrypha. Very familiar is he with the history, story and doctrine of each book. The vigor of the Hebrew prophets finds expression in his moral energy. His sympathy for humanity and love of righteousness take their rise from the mighty currents of the inspired Word. Does not his familiarity with the contents of the sacred volume let us into the secret of his power? D. M. P.

Immortality and the New Theodicy.

By George A. Gordon, D.D., Minister of the Old South Church in Boston, author of "The Christ of Today" and "The Witness to Immortality in Philosophy, Literature and Life." 16mo, $1.00.

"The style of the book is remarkably fine and its spirit is as beautiful as it is exalted. Even those who are opposed to the positions of the author will be stimulated to reflection in defense of their own opinions, and the volume illustrates the true temper in which theological discussions should proceed."—The Congregationalist.

"A discussion of uncommon breadth and thoroughness. It is one of the few statements of the argument for immortality from the standpoint of the entire spiritual life of the universe instead of from the standpoint of human life under historic conditions."—The Outlook, N. Y.

The Open Mystery.

A Reading of the Mosaic Story. By Mrs. A D. T. Whitney, author of "Faith Gartney's Girlhood," "Patience Strong's Outings," "The Gayworthys," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

In this book Mrs. Whitney seeks to interpret the Pentateuch so as to enlist livelier and profounder interest in the Mosaic story. Back of the simple narrative she finds deep and helpful suggestions for our daily life and stimulus to our wiser thought.

Nelson's New Series of Teachers' Bibles

NEW ILLUSTRATIONS NEW CONCORDANCE
NEW HELPS NEW MAPS

These Teachers' Bibles contain new Bible Helps, entitled "The Illustrated Bible Treasury," written by Leading Scholars in America and Great Britain.

UPWARDS OF 350 ILLUSTRATIONS

New York Observer says:

"'The Illustrated Bible Treasury.' There is no book like this. Its aim is to place the student in the age and atmosphere when each book of the Bible was written, to enable the reader to study the book amid its surroundings and to become permeated with its life. The writers who have combined to make the volume are among the most celebrated Bible students, scholars, Egyptologists and divines of Great Britain and America.

"More than three hundred and fifty illustrations accompany the text, and all of them are of value to the students of the Bible. They are not pictures so much as guides and expositors in the Holy Word. The teacher who has this treasury will be able to bring forth things new and old for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness, to answer objections, refute arguments and uphold the truth of God. Such a book demands attentive study and rewards it. It is a result of ripe learning consecrated to the best of uses, and will be of great service to those who read and teach the word of God."

The Independent says:

"It is one of those wonderful 'helps' to the popular study of the Bible which both illustrates the enormous amount of fruitful, critical study which has been applied to the Bible in our time and gives the best possible assurance that the Sacred Book has gained in weight, importance and in the reverent feeling of the people for it. Of all the 'aids' for the popular study of the Bible, which belong in the general class of Teachers' Bibles, this is easily foremost and best. . . . The marked feature of the 'Treasury' is that every part of it is new, and that it contains none of that sequacious compilation which is based on works once in repute but which at the best rise no higher than belated attempts to bring an old thing up to the gauge of a new one. . . . The number of contributors who have taken part in the work is thirty-eight. They make a list which commands confidence and challenges admiration. . . . We welcome the 'Treasury' as a fair, scholarly and judicious help to the popular study of the Bible on a cautiously critical basis."

SOME NOTABLE BOOKS

A History of Anti-Pedobaptism

By Prof. A. H. Newman, D. D., LL. D., of McMaster University. 12mo, 426 pages. $2.00.

"Since the timely and almost solitary contribution of note, in the English language, to the history of the 'Anabaptists,' by Dr. Henry S. Burrage, sixteen years ago, no work on the subject comparable in worth with Professor Newman's has appeared in English. Meanwhile the available material and discussions in foreign languages have very greatly increased. The text gives continuous evidence of the author's careful and conscientious use of the best and most recent sources of information."—Prof. Benjamin O. True, D. D., in The Watchman.

Inspiration Considered as a Trend

By D. W. Faunce, D. D. 246 pages, 12mo. $1.00.

Christian Work says: "We doubt if there ever was a period in this world's history when this book was more needed or more calculated to do good. The whole subject is handled in a clear and masterly manner. The arguments brought to bear, the logical deductions and conclusions, are strong and convincing. At a time when the Bible is being so violently and craftily assailed, even in the name of the cause sought to be destroyed, no book can be more heartily welcome than this one. It will open in the mind of every reader a new and powerful line of thought."

Messages of To-day to the Men of To-morrow

By George C. Lorimer, D. D. 464 pages, 12mo. $1.50.

A book deserving a place by the side of Henry Ward Beecher's "Lectures to Young Men," and up to date in every way. Every young man desiring a sympathetic and ringing presentation of present day truths and duties will find it here.

Dr. Dunning's

A Popular History of the Origin, Belief, Polity, Growth, and Work of our Denomination.

With Introductions by R. S. STORRS, D. D., and Gen. O. O. HOWARD, LL. D., and special chapters by Dr. J. E. ROY, Dr. A. H. QUINT, Dr. F. E. CLARK, and Rev. H. A. BRIDGMAN. 552 pp., with numerous portraits and illustrations. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt top.

This is a book which should find a place not only in every Sunday school and public library but in every Congregational family. It is full of information of value not only to Congregationalists but to all students of American History, inasmuch as early Congregationalism is so interwoven with Colonial history that one can hardly be understood without a knowledge of the other.

The subject is treated in a popular rather than in a technical way, thus making an extremely interesting as well as valuable book.

WHAT IS SAID ABOUT IT.

REV. DR. R. S. STORRS.—"The volume by Dr. Dunning, 'Congregationalists in America,' is one of universal interest and of permanent value. . . . It should have, what I am sure it will have, a wide distribution among intelligent and thoughtful readers."

REV. CHARLES H. RICHARDS, D. D., Philadelphia, Pa. —"It is the most comprehensive, judicious and satisfactory account in popular form of the rise and growth of our denomination, and especially of its work in this country, which has yet appeared."

REV. GEORGE A. GORDON, D. D., Boston, Mass.—"I regard it as a careful and exceedingly valuable account of 'Congregationalists in America.' . . . The work has, in fact, no competitors and should have, as it justly deserves, the widest circulation."

How to get it at about One-Third its Former Cost.

This valuable work was brought out a short time ago as a subscription book, and quite extensively sold through agents at $2.75 net. By special arrangements with The Pilgrim Press, which now controls the book, we are able to offer it to subscribers to The Congregationalist for

DO YOU THINK?

Do you know the difference between crucible and open hearth steel?

Do you know the difference between a steel forging and a casting?

Do you understand how a part of a bicycle made of forged steel is better than a part bent up out of sheet metal?

If you know these things, it will be easier for us to sell you a Victor bicycle.

You should know that bicycles are not advertisements, not name plates, not noise.

Bicycles are

First, MATERIAL;
Second, WORK,

You can know all about your bicycle by carefully examining these two things.

Remember, most bicycles are made to sell; not to ride.

Few bicycle makers invite the rider to examine carefully into all material used, before buying. We like this way of selling bicycles. The more you inquire, the better pleased we are.

Victor bicycles cost more to build than other bicycles, and they are worth more.

If you have a high grade neck, ride a high grade wheel. We prefer to say "Victor grade," since it means more.

THESE Easter days give new emphasis to the divine assurance: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." They make the death of our beloved less a shadow on our lives, more an opening through which other world glory streams out on our paths. That was a day of supernatural gloom in which our Saviour hung on the cross. But the second morning after forms transfigured with light anticipated the dawn, standing beside his empty tomb. What is there now to fear in death, since he proved that he had life in himself, and said, "Because I live, ye shall live also?" Has not he promised, "If a man keep my word he shall never see death?" Dr. Kincaid, lying on the brink of the other world a few weeks ago, said: "I did not think it possible; this is sinking into the arms of God. Nothing troubles me." That is what Christ has done for our friends in their dying, whose death is precious to us and to him. That is what he will do for us. We need not fear death any more. "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Those who are trying to label John Watson, D. D., with the tag of heresy should read his recent address to clergymen on the Positive Note in Preaching, in which he laid down the propositions that preaching has too largely lost the positive note; that a preacher ought to be positive, and positive about the right things and in the right spirit. What are the right things? "Revelation—that God has spoken to us in the evangel; the deity of Christ—that Christ is the Son of the Father in a sense which can be asserted of no other man; redemption—that Christ by his sacrifice does deliver the human soul from the power of sin; the Holy Ghost—that God ministers grace to the soul by his indwelling Spirit; the life to come—that there will be another life with moral distinctions." Is he a Unitarian? Hear him say, "It is evident that Unitarianism has done its work and has no promise of life. Its strength did not lie in the denial of our Lord's deity—no religious body can stand on a negation—but on its affirmation of God's Fatherhood. . . . It is impossible for the preacher to speak unkindly of those who have kept the Master's commandments so perfectly, but it is also impossible for him to make any concessions to their negation, as the deity of Christ is the very heart of our faith." Note that he says "deity" not "divinity."

Professor Harnack's recently published conclusions concerning the early dates of the books of the New Testament are most welcome. We have always believed that the positions he holds on these points are correct. Several of our contemporaries point to the great weight given by his eminent scholarship to the statements they have so ably and consistently defended. At the same time they point out how utterly unreliable is Professor Harnack on other points concerning which he differs from their views. This shows how well defined are the limits of scholarship in theological and Biblical studies.

The eastern committee, appointed by the American Board to take measures to increase contributions, invited corporate members in Boston and vicinity to a lunch at the Bellevue Hotel last Thursday, and proposed some plans which were discussed at length. It was agreed that certain steps should be taken which may better be described after their usefulness has been tested by experiment. The committee was deeply in earnest, and their feeling was shared by the members of the Prudential Committee and the other guests. If the receipts of the Board should continue through the year to fall off at the rate of the last seven months, there would be a debt of not far from $100,000. This, with the further retrenchment made necessary, would mean nothing less than the destruction of some very important missions; and, after the successful effort to lift the debt last year, another heavy debt would operate disastrously on the churches at home. There are some encouraging signs to relieve these anxious forebodings, but much self-sacrifice at this time is required of those who value the giving of the gospel to their fellowmen in other lands.

As a means of quickening and fostering the spiritual life, Quiet Days, or Retreats, as they are called, are coming slowly into more general use. These are devotional meetings extended through one or two days and conducted by men whose experience, as well as natural ability, has given peculiar fitness for the service. Originally a tradition of the church, they now are being adopted by an enlarging circle of earnest men and women whose efforts in behalf of the good of others draw heavily upon their spiritual reserves. The Quiet Day observed last week by the men and women connected with Boston's social settlements and described on page 528 was a period of deep significance, not only for the large number present but as indicating the essentially religious character of the social settlement movement and the growing need which those engaged in it feel of nourishing their own spiritual lives, as well as their philanthropic motives, at the fountain of all strength.

A word of caution is needed against a too hasty generalization in regard to the accumulation of wealth which is becoming common. Some people seem to believe that a large fortune cannot possibly be gathered righteously. We have seen the statement more than once that "a man cannot make a million dollars honestly." A little reflection ought to convince any one that this is untrue. Doubtless the number of large fortunes due in part at least to disregard of the obligations of religion and honor is considerable. There may even be comparatively few such accumulated by strict integrity. Yet to declare that to become very rich righteously is impossible is a manifest overstatement. Some men have a genius for money-making and also are providentially afforded exceptional opportunities. Some have special success in ordinary business. Others invent highly remunerative improvements in machinery, or something else necessary to the world. We never have heard it claimed that Dr. Pearsons, for example, has made his evidently considerable fortune unhandsomely. Nor does any one, so far as we are aware, accuse Mr. Edison of having become worth a million or more, as is alleged, by wronging anybody else. They who succeed, however, need to be specially watchful lest they fail to use wealth as creditably as they have won it. If they forget that God merely has intrusted it to them as stewards, both they and their children may become the worse for it.

A Sabbath observance society sends us a circular requesting us not to post letters on Saturday afternoon or Sunday, and not to send letters requiring answers at such a time that they will reach their destination on Saturday, for the reason that we ought not to invite replies which may be sent by Sunday mails. It is by such impracticable nonsense as this that many who are in sympathy with Sunday, temperance and other reforms are kept from giving support to reform movements. They are reasonably unwilling to unite themselves with persons whose want of judgment tends to make righteousness appear ridiculous. Fortunately, there are organizations through which intelligent men and women may labor to promote public morals, and one of their duties is to see that these organizations do not fall into the control of those whose well-meant efforts weaken the causes they want to help.

"The ceaseless rattle of religious machinery," is Dr. W. S. Rainsford's expression for a considerable portion of church work that lacks the guidance and power of the divine commission. Judging by the recent sermon from which this sentence is taken, the rector of New York's most famous institutional church is fearful lest the paraphernalia and machinery essential to carrying on many of our modern forms of church activity will reduce Christian service to a monotonous and perhaps fruitless grind. It is significant that such a note of warning came from a man who has been so vigorously championing the institutional idea. We do not infer that he has altered his conception of the duty of the modern church to the world, but he evidently desires to have the church in its new work and many organizations retain the beauty and the power of a spiritual gospel. That is what is desirable everywhere, be the church in city or country, be it institutional, family, or of no distinctive type.

No object lies so near the hearts of some Christians as that of bringing Jews to believe in Christ. Some even have adopted the national pride of the ancient Jew and believe that his race is to be gathered again in Palestine, and that he is to govern the whole world from Jerusalem. With such romancing we have no sympathy, though we rejoice over every Jew who is made a genuine disciple of Christ. But we invite attention to the fact that very little real success has attended efforts to Christianize Jews. Some professed proselytes from that race have done a good business in collecting funds, ostensibly for that purpose, with the same spirit in which their ancestors once took spoil from the Egyptians. We are periodically solicited for funds to carry on a wonderful mission among the Jews in Jerusalem. To those who have investigated that matter it does seem wonderful that such a humbug should gain credence and money. The most prominent missionary among the Hebrews of New York, a widely known Jew, has been proved to be a gambler and otherwise utterly unworthy of confidence, though in spite of evidence of these facts he has been supported by some of the foremost Christian ministers of that city. The moral of these and other similar incidents is not that all efforts to convert Jews should be abandoned, or that all converted Jews should be distrusted, but that the business end of such work would better be in the hands of Christians who will render accurate accounts of receipts and expenditures.

CHRIST IN THE RISEN LIFE

Jesus alone among founders of great world religions made explicit promises of activity in behalf of his disciples after his own death. The teaching and activity of Confucius, Gautama, Mahomet, ended with their removal from earth's life. The teaching and activity of Jesus, according to his own word, were only raised to a higher plane by his resurrection. Death with him was not an end. It was merely the completion of an earlier stage of his activity, the beginning of a larger life to be spent in the service of his church. He was not raised, like Lazarus or the widow's son of Nain, to die again. "But he, because he abideth forever, hath his priesthood unchangeable. Wherefore also he is able to save to the uttermost them that draw near unto God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."

Our Easter joy is joy in the risen and ascended Lord, who is still touched with the feeling of our infirmities. On earth he was our high priest by sacrifice. In heaven he is our high priest by service. After his triumph over death our Lord spent but a few days with his disciples. He confirmed their faith, he taught them out of the Scriptures, he gave them their commission. Then he departed to his work and expectation in the heavenly life, and left them to their tasks and trials with the promise of the presence of the Paraclete. The lesson and the hope of Easter time are not complete with the angel's message or the meetings of the disciples with their risen Lord. They pass on by the ascension and the coming of the Spirit to the experience of the church militant and of the church triumphant.

Already, before that first Easter morning, our Lord had made a beginning of the work of his heavenly life. That malefactor who had confessed him on the cross found him waiting at the gate of paradise with welcome and direction. He had already gathered the nucleus of the church on earth, he began now to gather the nucleus of the church above. He makes men sharers of his triumph who have been sharers of his suffering. Martyrs and confessors as they passed away from earth found welcome and direction and took their places in the growing body of the church above. To every Christian the joy of his presence is the goal of life and death. To depart is to be with Christ, and "it is very far better" to the believing soul.

In our Easter rejoicing we are too apt to leave this thought of our Lord's heavenly activity out of the account. We see him risen, gracious in dealing with faint-hearted and unbelieving disciples, but the thought of Easter as the beginning of his glorious age-long work escapes our vision. We remember the promise of his presence with his church on earth, but we forget his activity in behalf of every individual disciple in the resurrection life. This earthly experience is but a fraction of our immortal destiny. The best joy, the abiding peace, the untroubled intercourse with friends, the steady and fruitful activity are all beyond, in the many mansions where Christ is preparing a place for us. He shall receive us. He is already making provision for us, there as well as here. The sense of homelessness which we feel sometimes in our earthly dwellings will be forever at an end when we go home to him.

Our Lord's work in the risen life concerns both worlds. In the spiritual realm he is preparing a place for us, confessing before his Father and the angels those who have confessed his name on earth, preparing the redeemed for new and joyful activities and responsibilities. On earth he is preparing all things for his coming and his judgment. The forces of wickedness which he suffers, the activities of good which he crowns, wars and rumors of war, the researches, discoveries and conjectures of students, the unrest of men and the dreams of enthusiasts—all help in preparation for his coming.

The risen Lord is the returning Lord. Death has no more dominion over him. The triumphs of evil cannot overcome his patience. The changes of the nations cannot hasten or retard his triumph. To prepare his people, both by their life on earth and by their resurrection life, for that great consummation is the purpose and occupation of our risen and ascended Lord. His humiliation is forever at an end, though the humiliation of his church on earth continues. His glory is, however, established. But he is not content until he makes us sharers of that glory—one with him in loving service as in his earthly life he was one with the Father who had sent him.

O chime of sweet Saint Charity,
Peal soon that Easter morn
When Christ for all shall risen be,
And in all hearts new born!

PRESERVE THE FORESTS

The preservation of the forest cover on the hills in which streams rise is of the utmost importance. It holds the floods in check like a great sponge, and lets the moisture drain out at a gentle, steady rate for a long time, keeping up the needed supply during the weeks when the rainfall is scanty or absent. The great destruction of life and property now going on in the valleys of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers helps to make impressive the consequences of stripping the timber from the regions about their headwaters. Some one has said that for every tree thus cut down in Minnesota a life is lost in Mississippi. Many of the destructive floods which are becoming so frequent, even at the East, could be prevented, or greatly lessened, by a proper management of the forests along the streams. On the other hand, the periodical drying up of many rivers heretofore furnishing abundant water power is undoubtedly due to the reckless cutting down of the forests about their headwaters.

For this reason alone the action of President Cleveland in February last, in accordance with the recommendations of the Forestry Commission, was of great importance to a large area of our country. He issued a series of proclamations setting apart thirteen new forests reserves, aggregating over twenty million acres in South Dakota, Montana and States west of the Rocky Mountains. Reservations which had already been made aggregate about eighteen million acres.

Unfortunately the Government has permitted settlers, miners and others to cut timber on public lands for various purposes, and, under cover of such permission, a great amount of timber has been stolen, in addition to a vast amount lawfully appropriated by private parties. But under the President's proclamations the cutting of timber by unauthorized persons on the reserved lands was punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Hence the new proclamations aroused intense opposition in the States where the reserves were made. Telegrams and letters poured in upon Congress to undo this "wrong." The Senate, on Feb. 28, added to the sundry civil bill a paragraph restoring to public entry all the land set apart by the proclamations. The House proposed, instead, that the Secretary of the Interior be given power to regulate the cutting of timber on all forest reserves and to sell such timber, and that the President be empowered to modify or vacate any order creating a forest reservation, a power he does not now possess. To this last provision, only, the Senate agreed, and in that form the bill passed. But, inasmuch as it met with a pocket veto, the bill failed to become a law, the forest reservations still stand, and no one has any authority to alter or abolish them.

What is now needed most of all is a law to administer and protect these reserves. The American Forestry Association has labored long and earnestly to promote a proper understanding of the forestry question, and has been ably seconded by many State forestry associations. It has sought to make the public clearly understand that forestry means, not the isolation of the forests, but their utilization. Forestry regards the forest as a perpetual crop, to be harvested year after year and made to pay a handsome revenue, without any danger of extermination. A forest can, in fact, be improved and made more valuable by a judicious use of the ax.

The task of the forester and the object of forest management are, in the main, to obtain a continuous supply of a given amount of useful wood from the smallest area possible and with the least expenditure of energy and money.

This is the owner's view of the matter. The community or the State has also to consider the effect of a properly managed forest upon the water supply of the adjoining country, upon the protection of farm lands from the wind, upon the checking of evaporation and upon the beautifying of the landscape. That the latter is a consideration of real money value does not seem to be realized by those who are stupidly allowing many attractive mountain regions (notably the White Mountains) to be ruined by the ax of the wood pulp manufacturer and the all-devouring furnace of the charcoal burner.

The efforts of all friends of forestry throughout the country should now be directed towards securing for the forest reserves a wise and enlightened management, so that not only may the water supplies be conserved and the forests kept from extermination by fire and timber thieves, but a permanent revenue to the Government from this source insured. There is no doubt but that in Congress a desperate attempt will be made to undo the work now accomplished. The ten Northwestern senators are strongly urging that the reservations be abolished. But they are not likely to carry the Government with them to that extent. An amendment has been proposed to the sundry civil bill, now pending in the Senate Committee on Appropriations, providing for a thorough survey of the forest reservations, and for regulations for administering them in a rational way. It is known that a large number of senators favor this proposal. This is the opportune time for concerted and vigilant action on the part of those who are interested in substituting a rational and equitable system in place of the selfish and unscientific cutting of public timber which is now going on at so rapid and destructive a rate.

I say to all men, far and near,
  That he is risen again;
That he is with us now and here,
  And ever will remain.

And what I say, let each this morn
  Go tell it to his friend,
That soon in every place shall dawn
  His kingdom without end.

WHY PRAY FOR OTHERS

Referring to a recent article in The Congregationalist where a man dated the beginning of relief in business trouble from prayer offered for him at a meeting which he was to have attended and did not, will you allow a question which has troubled me much before as well as now? Would not God have given him the relief unless his friends had interceded for him; and if not, why not? I have been used to tracing a likeness between an earthly and a Heavenly Father in treatment of children, and I cannot help the feeling that if, when in trouble and deserving relief, I am not likely to get it unless a brother asks my father to grant it, I have a rather capricious and unjust father. If I deserve it and it is best for me, I ought to have it in any event. If I do not, am I more deserving because others ask for me, or is it best for me because of their asking? C. B. H.

The question of this correspondent has doubtless perplexed many of our readers, as it has perplexed ourselves. The experience of fatherhood helps us to understand God. Christ said, "If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?" Why should not he give good things just as freely to those who don't ask him? Christ did not answer this question. Therefore we cannot answer it.

But of this much we are sure. The only knowledge of God as our Father comes to us through the Bible. Nor does what we know of fatherhood reveal to us all that is to be known of God. If, then, we accept what the Bible reveals to us of him in this character we shall accept what it further reveals to us of his disposition and will.

Everywhere in the Bible we are assured that God hears and answers prayer. Its refrain is, "The righteous cry, and the Lord heareth and delivereth them out of all their troubles." He invites prayer: "Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee." "Pray one for another," is also a divine injunction. Holy men did this, as recorded in the Old Testament and in the New, and their prayers were answered. Moses prayed for his people, and God gave him his request. Job prayed for his friends, and God promised to accept his prayer. Christ prayed for his disciples. He prayed for others besides: "Neither for these only do I pray," he said, "but for them also that believe on me through their word." He told his disciples to pray for others. He intimated to Peter that he would have been lost, but said, "I have prayed for thee." When Peter was in prison "prayer was made without ceasing of the church unto God for him," and he was delivered. See our comment on that incident in this week's Sunday school lesson, page 535.

Paul often asked others to pray for him, counseling the churches that they should pray "with all perseverance and supplication for all saints, and for me." He spoke earnestly of his continual prayer for others. He recognized "intercession for the saints according to the will of God," and we are assured that Christ "ever liveth to make intercession" for those who come unto God by him.

These are only specimen instances of what everywhere appears in the Scriptures which reveal God to us. If we had not them, but had some idea of God as acting like a human father, we might perhaps expect that he would provide for all his children what they need, without any reminder or attention from us. But the God revealed to us in the Bible evidently commands and expects us to pray for others, and promises to answer prayers thus made in faith. Therefore we go to him with requests for our friends, knowing that we make these requests with very imperfect knowledge of what is really best for them, but rejoicing in every evidence that through our common Father we have brought blessings into their lives.

The Lord is risen indeed.
He is here for your love, for your need;
Not in the grave nor the sky,
But here where men live and die;
And true the word that was said,
"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

THE GOOD NEWS OF THE RISEN CHRIST

Surprise was the chief emotion in the hearts of the disciples when they first realized that Jesus had risen from the dead. But surprise, although probably they did not soon cease to wonder at the resurrection, was dominated at once by delight at being able to see, hear and associate in some measure once more with him whom they supposed to have gone from them forever. They must have been surprised afresh by the ascension. They did not grasp the real significance of either until afterwards. But the resurrection was a cause of true and lasting joy to them, because they were taught by it that somehow Christ was mightier than death. All which he had taught them received new emphasis because the teacher had so proved his divine power.

To the believer the memory of the resurrection is joyful, not only because it was fitting, beautiful and unspeakably gratifying as an event in Christian history, but also because it is the pledge of our own future rising. It establishes that concerning which all human hearts crave definite knowledge—the fact of a future life. It is evidence not to be disproved. The risen Jesus was the real, true Jesus, yet not exactly as they had known him. He displayed new powers. He evidently had experienced some radical change in body. As clear to them as the fact that they saw him and talked with him once more was the additional fact that he had entered into a new and wonderful existence, the beginning and a little of the characteristics of which he permitted them to see for their encouragement.

This is the great reason why the news of the resurrection of Jesus always has been, and always will be, deemed good news. It proves the life beyond the grave. It is one of the cornerstones of the gospel. It is a relief to every burdened heart, and an inspiration to every worker for the Master.

CURRENT HISTORY

The Enforcement of Law

Scarcely a day passes that sections of society, dissatisfied with the enforcement or non-enforcement of law, do not organize to bring about less or more activity and conformity to duty by public officials. Hence the multiplicity of law and order leagues and personal liberty leagues in this country. This implies that our public servants have too little regard for their oaths, that they assume legislative as well as executive functions, and either read into or out of the law such provisions as they intend to enforce or ignore. That society is alert and constantly attempting to compass its ends and incarnate justice is a sign of health, but it is lamentable that there should be so much need to compel executive officials to execute law.

How large a place this task of watching officials has come to assume in the life of society today may be inferred from the situation here in Massachusetts at the present time. Investigating committees are now probing into the administration of the State militia, the Boston Police Commission and one of the largest life insurance companies of the State; while the Grand Jury of Suffolk County has just reported indictments of fifteen men serving the city of Boston as contractors, and an investigation of the recent explosion at Boylston Street and Tremont Street is under way, attempting to determine responsibility for the gross carelessness that caused that horror. It is true that this condition of affairs is not creditable, and that the work of investigation entails much expense of time, labor and money, but far better investigation, exposure and punishment than condonation and worse states of incompetency and venality.

The People at the Polls

The results of Rhode Island's State election and St. Louis's and Cleveland's municipal elections indicate that there the Republican party is still strong enough to win. The results in all the cities East and West, however, plainly show that voters are growing more and more independent and discriminating, and are refusing to accept the nominations forced on them by men who dominate the State machines. This is seen in the action of the citizens of Providence, R. I., Cincinnati, O., and Chicago, Ill., last week, being especially marked in the last two cities. Cincinnati, which gave Mr. McKinley a large majority, has elected a Democratic mayor and dethroned a disreputable Republican boss, by name Cox, one of Senator Foraker's lieutenants. The result in Chicago, while deplorable for its immediate effect, will bring about good in the end. Mr. Harlan's remarkable campaign as an independent candidate has given him a position as a leader which, if he acts wisely, will make him inevitably the candidate of the reform forces when the reaction from Mr. Harrison's "wide open" policy comes. A man who, self nominated, can rally 66,858 voters around him on a platform demanding civil service reform, municipal revenue from franchises and execution of all laws has a future if his personal character will bear investigation.

Much is said about the anti-Republican outcome of the spring town and municipal elections, as proof of a reaction against the party for its new tariff, its failure to give currency reform, and the delay of business prosperity. There is a measure of truth in this, but it has been exaggerated by those who, like Mr. Bryan, already see victory in 1900 perching on the banners of silver Democracy. President McKinley's appointment of three commissioners who are to visit Europe and prepare the way for an international bi-metallic conference, is the second step of the Administration toward redemption of the party's pledge. The commissioners, Senator Wolcott of Colorado, ex-Vice-President A. J. Stevenson and Senator Charles J. Paine of Massachusetts, are all bi metallists.

The Flood of Waters

President McKinley and Congress have come to the relief of the farmers, planters, merchants and sojourners in the lower Mississippi Valley. The President set forth the situation in a terse message, showing that the disaster was great, that local authorities were unable to cope with the crisis, and that precedent favored such relief from the Federal Treasury. Congress, within two hours, had set aside $200,000, and this is already doing its mission of beneficence under the supervision of the Secretary of War and his subordinates. Memphis is the center of relief operations, and food and medical supplies will be the chief relief given. Of course there can be no attempt to do much more than this. Later, Congress will have to appropriate funds to repair damage wrought on Federal works, but the vast burden of the damage will rest on individuals and the States. How vast that burden will be may be inferred from the statement issued by the Department of Agriculture. It refers only to territory south of Cairo, Ill., while north of that the damage has been scarcely less great.

The total area under water April 6 was about 15,800 square miles, of which 7,900 square miles was in Mississippi, 4,500 square miles in Arkansas, 1,750 square miles in Missouri, 1,200 square miles in Tennessee and 450 in Louisiana. This region contained in 1890, so far as can be determined in view of the somewhat indefinite boundary lines of the flood, a population of 379,685. The flooded districts contain, it is estimated, about 39,500 farms. The value of these farms and implements is about $65,000,000.

What effect the flood will have upon the crops of the present season depends upon the length of its continuance and the practicability of wheat planting after the subsidence of the flood. The entire region under water on April 6 produced last year about 370,000 bales of cotton, valued at close on $13,000,000, over 11,000,000 bushels of corn, worth about $3,400-000 and wheat, oats, potatoes and hay worth over $800,000 more.

Fortunately, as we go to press, the floods seem to be subsiding.

The Greater New York Charter

Mr. Theodore Roosevelt's appointment to the place of Assistant Secretary of the Navy will give Mr. Long an assistant whose executive ability has been tested in many important positions and whose technical knowledge of matters which he will have to consider is far from meager. In fact, Mr. Roosevelt has made a study of the naval history of this country, and has always kept well informed respecting the latest developments of our naval structure. Whether he will prove to be a tactful and obedient subordinate remains to be seen. His departure from the New York Police Commission will remove from it its most pronounced personality and valiant foe of corruption, but Mayor Strong now has another opportunity to select a man of the same type who nevertheless may do a work which Mr. Roosevelt could not. His brave veto of the Greater New York charter, last week, was a surprise even to his best friends, who feared that the fact that he as one of the commission that drafted the charter and assented to it as a whole would make him feel that as mayor of New York he must also assent to it, notwithstanding the amount of evidence and solid argument against its ratification which have been marshaled since the people have had an opportunity to analyze and weigh the result of the charter commissioners' labor. If the legislature, obedient to the orders of Mr. Platt, re-enacts the charter, notwithstanding Mayor Strong's veto, then Greater New York will presumably come into being on Jan. 1 next. But it will do so with a body of law pronounced by experts as defective in many vital particulars, and sure to create an incalculable amount of litigation.

Our Foreign Policy

Spanish concessions respecting the release of our citizens captured in Cuba have lessened the tension. Our navy is still being used to watch Cuban filibusters, and the Administration is practically following the policy of Mr. Cleveland in this matter. General Rivera, the captured Cuban leader, will not be shot; hence, the Senate's resolution on this subject was needless.

The selection of Hon. J. W. Foster and ex-Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Hamlin as special commissioners to negotiate with Great Britain respecting the regulations which ought to govern both nations in capturing seals in the Bering Sea shows discrimination on the part of the Executive. They know the details of the controversy and the technical matters in dispute as no other two men in this country, and they have decision of character. The latter may be called for, for the issue is a grave one. Lord Salisbury and Mr. Olney differed radically, and both countries may soon wish that an arbitration treaty were in existence instead of dangling, as it were, in mid-air, too attenuated to fall to ground.

Japan has ordered immigration to Hawaii stopped for a time, but she also has sent two men-of-war to Honolulu. We shall soon have two there also. That the situation is critical there is no use in denying. Our Government must move soon and decisively or see Hawaii pass out of our hands, and that would be a blunder of gravest import to Hawaii and to us. Mrs. Dominis is still in Washington, and her latest scheme is said to have for its object inducing the United States to oust President Dole from his place and give the people an opportunity to decide between her and him as president of the republic.

No consideration of the general situation can ignore the fact that all of these problems must be settled for us, nominally at least, by a Secretary of State who is senile. Factional fights also are preventing the selection of a first Assistant Secretary of State, on whom he must lean.

Our Representative in Turkey

The fact that Turkey refused to elevate her representative to this country to the rank of ambassador has prevented our changing our representative there from minister to ambassador. This fact together with President McKinley's desire to avail himself of Hon. John W. Foster's ability in other positions of influence has made it improbable that Mr. Foster will represent us in Constantinople, though in certain contingencies he may still go. President Angell of Michigan University may be selected for this important place, and if he is it will be an excellent appointment. His experience as a diplomat when representing us at Peking and his ability and sterling character would insure such action by him as would satisfy all Americans.

The War in the East

On Friday, April 9, bands of Greeks crossed the Macedonian border and attacked Turkish outposts near Grevena, and from that time to this there has been desultory fighting in Macedonia. Greece disowns this action, and places responsibility for it upon "irregular" bodies of troops, members of the Greek national, revolutionary society. Turkey asserts that the Greek invaders were regular troops, and that Greece should assume responsibility for the aggression. But as we go to press war has not been declared, and formal orders to advance have not been given to either nation's army. The situation, however, is most grave, and few expect to see a collision averted.

If left to themselves the outcome of a fight between Greece, the Hellenic peoples of Turkey and the Turk would be difficult to forecast, for each has elements of strength and weakness. But the Powers have served notice on Turkey and Greece that neither can expect to reap the legitimate fruits of victory. Whether this mandate will survive the strain of actual war is doubtful. Most observers of the situation laugh at the "concert," which has failed so lamentably in dealing with the specific Cretan problem, and is quite as weak inherently when it comes to face the larger problems that will arise when once war begins. Germany is the marplot whose influence now is weighing heaviest against a peaceful solution of the problem, and she is goading Turkey on now that Russia and Greece have become less belligerent. Assuming war, how will the Powers align themselves? Will Greece be forced, as it were, to fight with hands tied to her side? These are insoluble problems now. Some signs there are that Great Britain, Italy and France are drawing nearer together, as they should by all affinities of forms of government and love of liberty. Naturally this, if true, will throw the three empires together.

It was thought certain at one time that a revolt against Turkey would begin in Macedonia if Greece assailed her there, and that allies for Greece would spring up in the Balkan states. But this is doubted now. However, if blood once flows, and race and religious hatreds are aroused, the end no man can predict. Greece will enter upon the contest secure of the sympathy and benison of Christendom, popular if not official; and Turkey with the hope in every Christian breast that her day as a European Power has set.

"Tuft-hunters" can prepare to entertain the king of Siam. He started Occidentward last week.

The citizens of British Columbia are petitioning the Canadian parliament to exclude Japanese immigrants.

Governor Bloxham of Florida, in his inaugural message, condemns lynching, and suggests legislation which will remedy grievances that cause, even though they do not justify, lynchings.

Who indorses the act of Boston's police commissioners authorizing the Chinese theater to open Sunday evenings? What if they do agree to give the proceeds to the Emergency Hospital?

The United States Supreme Court will not reconsider the question of railway pools legality under the Sherman anti-trust law until October. As yet the railways have not begun the rate war that was threatened.

The Earl of Stanhope, an impecunious Tory peer, has protested against the transfer of William Bradford's manuscript to this country. He wishes a quid for the quod, and thus illustrates the mercenary spirit of the tradesmen whom earls usually affect to despise.

The decree of the sultan of Zanzibar abolishing slavery, and promising compensation to all who suffer by this decree, if holding slaves legally, is a long step forward toward the betterment of conditions, not only on Zanzibar, but on the continent from whence its slave market victims come.

The death of Hon. D. W. Voorhees, United States ex-senator from Indiana, removes a typical Western Democrat. His best service to the country was his loyal support of Librarian Spofford in securing from Congress the legislation which authorized the construction of the splendid new Congressional Library.

The annual report of the New England Watch and Ward Society, just made, says:

> We know no reason for changing the statement we made in our report a year ago, viz.: "In our opinion there is neither a faro bank, a roulette game, a lottery office, nor a poolroom in Boston." This is a condition which exists in no other great city, a condition which we were told fifteen years ago by the police could never be secured, and to attempt which would be only to do harm.

So much of lubricity in our literature and art is due to French influence that any movement to purify French life will profoundly influence our life for the better. Hence such a debate as was held in the House of Deputies last week is to be heralded with joy. It showed that the responsible officials, members of the ministry, realized the desperate need of reform, censorship and purgation, and that they intend to enforce old and enact new restrictive laws.

Until all the facts are in, and the defendant's counsel have had an opportunity to summon witnesses and produce evidence, the public should suspend judgment respecting the guilt of Gen. A. P. Martin, of the Police Commission of Boston. His conduct as commissioner has made enemies for him among the brewers, gamblers and brothel-keepers of Boston, and none would rejoice more if their efforts to secure his removal from his position should succeed. His mind must have frequently reverted, during the past week, to those Proverbs of the Hebrew sage which describe the agony and shame which wayward and unfilial sons bring to parents.

IN BRIEF

Our readers will discover the wealth of material relating to Easter which this issue contains, as well as other editorial and contributed matter bearing upon themes of current and vital interest. One who reads the helpful Easter articles and poems by well-known authors will certainly be put in a mood to profit more by the public services of next Sunday. Forty-eight pages of such an issue certainly constitute a course in reading of no small proportions or consequence.

Christendom's Holy Week may help to make your individual life holy. Are you open to its blessed influences, or are you too busy, too cumbered with care?

The kinetoscope record of the Corbett-Fitzsimmons prize fight is said to be a dismal failure. The sun, as it were, veiled its face with shame, and refused to be particeps criminis.

Overriding our native instincts of humility, our publisher insists that we call attention to the special opportunity for securing the volume Congregationalists in America. Particulars are set forth on our advertising pages.

The Church Building Society gives notice of a special meeting to elect a president in place of Dr. H. A. Stimson, who declines reelection, not from any lack of sympathy with the work, but because he thinks it for the best interests of the society.

The serious, crucial question which genuine, liberty-loving Britons are turning over in their minds now is the one propounded by Rev. Dr. John Clifford: "Are we governed by the loan-mongers of Europe or by the three emperors, or are we governed by ourselves?"

The Cumberland Presbyterian justly protests because the contractor erecting the national Government's building on the exposition grounds at Nashville, Tenn., persists in defying the State law against Sunday labor and claims exemption because engaged on a Federal job.

A shrewd way of advertising by a magazine is to publish an article against current beliefs respecting the inspiration of the Bible, and then to send anonymous postal card requests to ministers to mention the article and give their opinions on it. But most ministers are shrewd enough to read between the lines.

Hugh Price Hughes says West London now is what Paris was twenty-five years ago, the center of vice for those men who while in civilization are not of it. He adds that it will never change until law makes it quite as wrong and dangerous for a man to solicit for lust as it is for a woman to solicit for bread.

All too brief cable messages respecting the discussion in Durham Presbytery relative to Ian Maclaren's orthodoxy or heterodoxy seem to indicate that the presbytery has no patience with the charges, and that men stand ready to roast Dr. Kennedy Moore on the same spit on which he proposes to roast John Watson, if he persists in pressing his charges.

It is one of our most conservative ministers who writes us thus concerning his appreciation of Professor Drummond: "His Ascent of Man is the most comforting volume I ever read. It makes spiritual existence so inferentially certain." So to old school and for new school men alike did the beloved and lamented Scotchman bring a fresh and reassuring sense of the reality of their faith.

President Harper appears in a new rôle. The University Baptist Church of Chicago has just elected him superintendent of its

Sunday school. Notwithstanding the burden of other duties, he is willing to add this to them in order that he may have the opportunity of putting into practice his theories of teaching the Bible. The experiments which he makes will be carefully watched.

Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, founder of the Christian Scientists' organization, has issued a statement to be read every Sunday in all the churches of that denomination, that the Bible and the Christian Science text book, of which she is the author, are "uncontaminated or fettered by human hypotheses and authorized by Christ." Will any Congregational church after this declaration issue letters of recommendation to its members to join that body?

The article in the Home Department signed Argand is so cheering in its conclusions and so convincing in its analysis of facts that we must remove the basket by which this Argand burner is screened and declare that the writer is Prin. C. F. P. Bancroft of Phillips Academy, Andover. All who read the article will be glad that now and then he ventures outside of his educational field and roams about among the important interests of woman's kingdom.

Mr. Moody, in a talk at Chicago recently said that which many Christian laborers need to heed:

> The day of rest is a necessity. I look forward to my Friday. I used to think because I was engaged in God's work that I could work seven days in the week, and I was older at thirty than I am now at sixty. I had not the spring or the vigor I now have.

One of the most ardent advocates of Sabbath observance this country ever had, weakened his physical strength and moral power by incessant toil seven days in seven.

Justice Brewer has given the Yale theologues some sensible counsel, as our report of his lecture shows. He evidently enjoyed the rare opportunity of talking back to the pulpit. Concurring with him in most of the other points he makes, we should take issue with his assertion that ministers ought not to write their sermons, a rule which he certainly has not always followed in his addresses before religious bodies. We believe this was the main contention in Mr. Blaine's celebrated address before the Boston Congregational Club some years ago, set forth, if we remember correctly, in a carefully written and elaborate paper.

It is a graceful and appropriate tribute to its late pastor, Rev. F. S. Adams, which the church at Reading is paying each Sunday. Mr. Adams, who had been with the church for seventeen years, was buried less than a month ago and since his death his people, not feeling that they can yet bear to see another in the place he was wont to fill, have drawn a white ribbon across his chair, while on his open Bible at the desk at which he stood to give to them God's message there lies a wreath of flowers. This expression of love and loyalty has deeply touched the ministers who have supplied the pulpit since Mr. Adams's passing on, as well as all who have seen it.

Dr. Lyman Abbott said of the story of Jonah swallowed by the fish: "Christ gives his personal sanction to the account of this miracle, which, more than any other in the Old Testament, has been subjected to criticism and even ridicule. We must either accept the Old Testament history of this miracle or believe that Jesus was a deceiver or was himself deceived." But that was a good while ago, when he was writing a commentary on the gospel of Matthew. At present he believes that the story of Jonah is fiction; and probably he would be as ready as any one to use this change of belief as an illustration that no good teacher regards himself, or wishes others to regard him, as infallible. No doubt, too, his change of opinion serves to make him more patient with those who now stand on the ground which he occupied not so very long ago.

Our recent allusion to the new minister in Drumtochty did not take into consideration all the facts relating to the ecclesiastical condition of the little Scotch village which Ian Maclaren has immortalized. We are indebted to Mr. Clifton Johnson, the well known illustrator, who spent several months in Drumtochty last spring, for the following completer statement: There are three churches in Logiealmond (Drumtochty), the Auld, the Free and the United Presbyterian. The latter two are next-door neighbors and the U. P. Kirk is just over the garden wall from the Free Kirk manse, where Dr. Watson used to live, but, curiously enough, the U. P.'s and their church are never mentioned in the Drumtochty stories. Last summer the minister of the little U. P. congregation was called to Glasgow and this Rev. Mr. McOuat is now to come in his stead to the Glen. It is, of course, the minister who occupies Dr. Watson's old pulpit in the Free Kirk who would be regarded critically by lovers of the novelist. This is Rev. David Tod, a genial and thoroughly able man. Few would bear comparison with Dr. Watson better than he.

A circular came to us last week calling attention to the Easter (Sunday) edition of one of the nasty metropolitan journals, and particularly requesting our notice of the fact that it had been commended by many New York clergymen, among them one of the best known Congregational clergymen of the city. We do not believe he sanctioned the use of his name in any such way, but if he did then Rev. Heber Newton's remarks on this subject are commended to him. Dr. Newton says:

> If the clergy can be made to appear as contributors to these papers, there is thus given a sort of ecclesiastical offset to the onslaughts of libraries, clubs and the ignorant populace in general who, not being moral teachers, cannot be expected to distinguish between the right and wrong of journalism. I, for one, have not felt like helping in this attempt to ward off the just attacks of an indignant public. It has not seemed to me that any possible good that could come from my thoughts, as expressed in the columns of these papers in their present condition, could offset the harm that would follow from this personal indorsement of these sheets. A column of sermon talk does not seem to me an antidote to many columns of pure sensationalism and nasty gossip and prurient scandal and brutalizing reports of brutal exhibitions. Spirituality and sensationalism, piety and pruriency, virtue and vulgarity, do not seem to me to make a good compound.

Editor Gilder of the Century spent the Holy Week of 1896 in Jerusalem and in the current number of his magazine has written a striking article upon the events of the week, dwelling particularly on the miracle of the Greek Fire. He questions if there is anything in all Christendom more beautiful and at the same time more blasphemous. Graphic, indeed, is his description of the contests of the various sects of Christians as in the presence of Christendom's most sacred shrines they vociferate loudly, and even lay hands upon one another as they frantically strive for precedence. The scene inspired Mr. Gilder to compose on the spot a poem entitled The Anger of Christ, which will surely take rank with his very best. Yet, after all, Mr. Gilder was not among those who are disillusioned by the sorrowful sights of modern Jerusalem. Keenly aware, as a man of his sensitive nature would be, of the filth, degradation and superstition everywhere evident, nevertheless he says:

> In the old days, as now, there were lepers and misery; then, as now, there was a city beautiful, worthy of love and tears; then, as now, there were goodness and brutality, envy and hypocrisy, and many a faithful heart. Jerusalem, Syria, this Ottoman empire—yes, and the un-Christian Christian world—need a Redeemer now as then, a Prince of Peace. All this comes upon one here with new and tremendous force.

CURRENT THOUGHT

AT HOME

The Biblical World (April) discusses at length the book of Jonah, concerning which it says: "As a matter of fact, there is no single piece of literature in the Old Testament which is more artistic in its form, more pedagogical in its method, or more logical in its thought." On another important point it asserts, "To make the whole fabric of Christianity hang upon a single thread, and that the interpretation of a book which has been the source of difficulty through all the ages, is, to say the least, unwise."

Prof. Earl Barnes, of Leland Stanford, Jr., University, in the Journal of Education describes some of the evils that are apparent now in our system of public school instruction, as the result of the necessary, but unsatisfactory, compromise on religious instruction: "In the first place, it tends to leave uncultivated the truest and finest instincts of childhood. Children are naturally religious. Left to themselves, they tend to develop a religion of their own. Intellectually, they demand a great first cause and constantly sustaining power. Emotionally, they demand a nature warm at the heart with love and sympathy. For the God and Christ and Mary and the prophets, who filled this craving in children's souls in the past, we are substituting patriotism, the flag and Abraham Lincoln and nature studies. This is all good, but we need something more. Even the love of humanity cannot satisfy the heart of an emotional boy of twelve. The second evil lies in the fact that our children are growing up ignorant of the Christian theology. . . . To leave a child without these fundamental conceptions is to leave him without the key to much of modern history, literature and art. . . . It is like trying to teach a boy Greek and Latin, at the same time keeping him ignorant of mythology."

ABROAD

The last volume of the proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research contains two valuable papers on Hypnotism and Hypnotic Phenomena, by Dr. J. Milne Bramwell. He says that, in his opinion, the cure of disease is by far the most important field of action for hypnotism, and testifies to personal knowledge of removal of pain; the habit of sleep restored to those suffering from insomnia; many functional diseases cured which had long resisted other forms of treatment; obsessions and painful memories blotted out; dipsomania, kleptomania and other vicious habits corrected and many functions of organic life, which were performed imperfectly or painfully, restored to their nominal condition. He affirms that the hypnotized person has a far-reaching power over his own organism, which the non-hypnotized person does not possess; and that "this increased power carries with it no penalty, and implies no interference with volition; and that the subject can reject, as readily as when awake, suggestions contrary to his moral sense."

Rev. Dr. John Clifford, Hugh Price Hughes and many other of the British Nonconformist leaders have not scrupled to go forth on recent Sunday afternoons and address mass meetings in London squares called to protest against British participation in the coercion of Greece. The Christian World calls attention to this as a significant phenomenon. "Those who can look back even a quarter of a century must know that in their youth the idea of a pious minister taking part in a Hydepark political demonstration on a Sunday would have seemed a contradiction in terms. A Sunday political platform and piety seemed mutually exclusive. It would have been as easy to imagine an Archbishop of Canterbury dancing a skirt dance in his robes on the stage of a variety theater."

A Verse in Luke

An Easter Story by Harriet Prescott Spofford

It has happened better with that Betty than you might have expected. Well, and it was a weary while she had my admonitions. But my mistress had aye a soft spot for the hussey, and it was she put her in the way of some advantages, and she's lady's maid in a grand family. But there's room yet.

We are up here ourselves too. For when my master found himself looking at the universe with other eyes after little Jo was so near stepping out into it, he had experiences of his own, and he is the preacher in a church—tut, tut, you could set the little old meeting house down in its front porch—and those blue lightnings of his eyes blaze out every Sabbath Day over folk that might as well count the stars in the sky as count their money.

But I was cast in my own mold, and I let the master think as he would; and I stayed the same, call it just what you will, that I was when I left my people down Bras d'Or way—whether I was born the odd one, or whether it was along of the old Gaelic grandfather a-speculating and searching the mist. I had been teaching the school down there—the dame school, to be sure. As if that Betty should—but when there's so much more outside my learning or Betty's or the master's, what does it come to? And as soon as they've one thing sure there's another turns up and puts it to open shame. And so it's the training more than the learning. And I trained them. Betty knows how. But there were some of the little towheads—well, I was never the one to regret the night we had the dispute about the outlook of the babies after death, and I shook the dust off my feet. Then was the time I happened on my mistress, and I've been her faithful care-taker, the dear lamb, from that day till this. "Dear," she says to me, "dear, you've a pride of intellect"—that's my spirit of controversy—"yet I doubt but your heart's fixed on the Almighty Love." So I go to the meeting with the best of them, and my silk gown rustles behind; and I sit at the head of the family pew and my mistress sits by the door, and I have my hands full with those sawnies—well, I'd call them impish—they're the twins, you know—if they weren't the master's very own, the thread and the thrum of them. "Why don't you take the bread?" they says to me one day of the communion. "Who would take the bread where you be?" I says. "And I've bitter bread of my own by token." But that's neither here ner there, for, as I was saying—but an old woman let's her tongue loose over a cup of tea, and it green as leeks—Betty's just left the place, and it's she was telling of Miss Provoost, she that's of the big house where Betty is in service, so she is.

It's not as if I hadn't been knowing to the most of it, this many's the day. For when I went on my mistress's errands down to the Felonies and such like spots, claiming the care of a policeman, very like, for myself, I'd be meeting her on the stairs where, with every third one gone and the post leaning, it was not pleasant for the two of us to come together. But her sweet face then always seemed to me like a shining candle in a dark place—a bonny face, fair, O yes, so fair, and the rose burns on the cheek, and there's a white forehead, with the hair that's neither gold nor copper color curling round it; and the eyes there are like stars in a midnight sky, so blue are they, and so bright and so dark, and there's a mouth like a red crushed flower; and it's all atop of a swan's throat and a tall queen's shape, with shoulders to hold a child's head.

I was down in the Three Deeps when I saw her come in the first time. She was wearing a gown of the dark green cloth with the linings of pale canary silk showing, and a great green hat and feathers, and a bunch of yellow primroses under her chin, and she was carrying a dirty little beastie of a boy in her arms regardless—as if she could ever be clean again! The carriage, she had Mrs. Van Cortright's carriage—she's the lady's sister, is Miss, and of the family, and the purse she has of her own was but enough to buy her pretty gowns and pay for her fooleries, though many's the family would take it for riches had they that same—the carriage, I say, had run over the boy, and perhaps the rogue saw his account in it, for he made such a to-do, and he no more hurt than the back of your hand, that she'd fetched him home, if it's home you call such places. And as she went up stair after stair, "Mind the third step, miss, a rat'd tip it!" he cries out. "And that's a broken board may let you down to"—never mind where—he cries again. And she picked her steps along the filthy hall-ways and through the passages that smelled like sewers, and into the top room, where they slept and worked and ate and cooked, when they cooked at all. There was no fire there then and the day was bitter. And she saw as she stood, too, the dark room beyond, with no window, where a woman lay, with no one to do a hand's turn to the fearful sore on her. And she waited, trembling, looking at them a minute; and she dropped the boy and just burst out crying. I'd gone after, having my own business. "Don't ye now, miss," says I, "don't ye cry, dear."

"O!" says she, "O, I never dreamed of anything like this! People—children"—

"Hush, now, hush!" says I. "They don't know they're so bad off. You'll be making them sense it, for, see, the back grows to the burden."

But directly she had herself in hand; and she looked about, and she asked outright questions, and they answered them, for the tears were still standing on her lovely cheeks. And she followed the mother into the dark room—I'd brought down the old linen, and I'd been by way of taking the mother's needle while she dressed the other woman's sore. "O!" Miss Frances cried again, as she stood there trembling. "To think that I've spent years learning how to play a tune, and have never learned how to do such a thing as that!" And she never minded the awfulness of the smell, but she kissed the poor woman, whose big, hollow eyes opened in dull wonder, and she emptied her pocket-book and broke her bunch of flowers among them. But it wasn't the money, it wasn't the flowers—it was the kiss, it was the tears. "I tink de loidy's stuck on us," said the little bit beastie she'd run over. And it was by way of good fortune I went with her when she got into the carriage again; she'd offered me the seat. "They're my own people!" she cried. "The children of my Father, same as if they were my own flesh and blood! And I've let them suffer like this while I was dancing!"

"Dancing is all very well in its way," said I. "It'd be a poor world with no dancing in it." And the moment the door slammed she fainted dead away.

That was the beginning of it. And the very next day she went to a great doctor and he took her to a hospital to learn; and at first, by some special arrangement, she went every morning and about her usual ways here and there afterward. And then Mrs. Van Cortright going over for the London season, Miss Frances stayed altogether at the hospital, except for such outing as she took down in the Felonies and at the Three Deeps; and she was quick and all on fire, like one possessed, and she learned the whole duty of nurses that year. Myself, as you know, I've always had my own way of looking at the miracles, but I saw a miracle wrought that day down in the tenement house. I saw Frances Provoost convicted of sin and forgiven, and filled with love, and experiencing all, well, the best, there is of religion in one minute.

That Betty came over one day in the fall, with more airs about her than a full-rigged ship. You'd have thought Victoria had sent for her to Windsor Castle while she was over seas with Mrs. Van Cortright. "And there's fine goings on over at our place," says she. And I wanted to hear what she had to tell that day, so that it wasn't in me to frown on her gossiping as I was used to do. "Our Miss Frances is all high for going as a nurse, and my lady won't hear to it." They'd been visiting with the nobility. "My lady," says that Betty, "my lady won't hear to it. 'You?' she says. 'My own sister? what nonsense! I always thought you had a level head, Frances. It's all a fad, and it'll ruin you! When you come to your senses Brinckerhoff will have come to his.'

"'O, Brinckerhoff!' says Miss Frances.

"'Why not Brinckerhoff?' cries Mrs. Van Cortright. 'He's a nice fellow, a charming man, well born, well bred, well educated, worth a dozen millions and in love with you.'

"'I am not sure that I am in love with him,' says Miss Frances.

"'You wouldn't let that interfere, I hope,' says Mrs. Van, quite stiff, and as if Miss Frances had said something indelicate.

"'Yes, I should,' says Miss Frances.

"'Frances,' cries the other then, 'you wouldn't let all that money go out of the family!'

"'There is more money than belongs to it in the family now,' says Miss Frances, sorrowfully.

"'I am not aware of any money in the Van Cortrights' possession that has not been acquired in an honorable manner,' says Mrs. Van, O, so topping, I do assure you.

"'What right have we, what right have I, to all this comfort, this luxury, this pleasure—and those others with nothing, with less than nothing!' cries Miss Frances, looking round her, and dipping both her hands into the great bowl of orchids and letting them stream off her fingers. Brinckerhoff had just sent them to her.

"'O,' says her sister, 'if you're coming to that I can't follow you. The right of possession, I suppose. I've no sympathy with socialists and anarchists and altruists and all those. I don't pretend to know better than the Lord who gave it to us and didn't give it to them!' I thought Mrs. Van rather had her there," says that Betty.

"Then the next time you've a toothache don't you do a thing to improve matters. The Lord gives it to you," says I.

"Well," answers Betty, "you needn't be so previous. I ain't said I wasn't on Miss Frances's side. Mrs. Van Cortright had come into Miss Frances's room all dressed for dinner. She had on one of the gowns we got in Paris. It was the one the queen of Portugal wanted when she saw it at Worth's, and we stood out for it ourselves."

"O, Betty, Betty," says I, "and you the little bound girl from Bra' d'or!"

"Well, I am bound to you still," says Betty, slyly. "If I wasn't I wouldn't take so much from you, and I in my position! But any way, there was a big emerald cross a-blazing on her breast, and every stone in it worth a fortune. She looked down to lay it straight with her twiddling white fingers. 'You can have one just like it, and a thousand times finer,' said she, 'if you will.'

"'I couldn't wear it,' said Miss Frances.

"'Couldn't wear it?'

"'It would be of no use to me,' said Miss Frances. 'I couldn't wear it that way when I remember whose feet were nailed to it.'

"'I declare, Frances, you're growing too morbid to live! You don't really tell me you hold by that antiquated story?' says Mrs. Van, bridling like anything.

"'All of it,' says Miss Frances.

"'How long since, may I ask?'

"'O, it came over me one day like the summer lightning, Jule. And I saw it, I felt it, O, just as if heaven opened! It isn't as if we weren't brought up in it, Jule.'

"'Do you mean to say,' sings my lady, 'that you believe the Maker of all this universe, if it had a maker, left it to take care of itself while he came down and lived and died here?'

"'O, yes,' said Miss Frances, quite pale, and drawing in her breath. 'And if he did how could I bear to make myself fine with the thing that gave him mortal agony?'

"'And if he didn't?' says Mrs. Van.

"'Then, if he was only a man whose soul thought out, whose life lived out, the ways that give us all our peace and pleasure, and who was willing to die rather than not help us, and did die for love of us, could I wear at dining and dancing as a bauble the thing that tortured him, on which he died?'

"And there's something in that, now ain't there?" says Betty.

"O, Betty, Betty," said I, "did I bring you up for this, with all my admonitions!"

"O, well," Betty answered, tossing her head, "when you tell me where to find you yourself, it'll be time o' day! 'And if there never was any such person at all?' says Mrs. Van. 'The idea, the ideal, remains,' says Miss, 'and lifts us whenever we sacrifice to it.' And my faith," says that Betty, "she shows whether it has lifted her or not! But as for Mrs. Van, 'I declare,' says she, 'your liver must be dreadfully out of order! You're getting to be a candidate for the mad house. I'm glad Van Cortright wasn't of your way of thinking when he bought the emeralds.' They didn't know I was there—I was in the dressing-room cleaning some lace. 'But if you're so bent on doing good,' says Mrs. Van, 'you had better think whether you can't do more good with Brinckerhoff's money than with your own little income,' says she.

"'Christ gave himself,'" said Miss Frances.

I was down in the region of the Felonies again, where I went doing a bit of work for the mistress, mayhappen, when I felt like, and I saw what Miss Frances meant. When I went in she was dressing a deep knife cut on a woman whose drunken husband had stabbed her in his frenzy and been so sorry for it afterward that she almost wished he hadn't done it, since it was going to let her out. Well, I finished my errand, which was in another room, and stepped round to the alley where there was a man dying of consumption. I minded him the last time I was by—he in a cellar that reeked with the damp and slime. But Miss Frances had been there, and the place was dried out and his bed had been changed. "I'm quite another man," says he, "since she began to come. I doubt but I'll win through after all." And he with the last breath waiting to gasp on his lips. But she'd given him that cheer. I came across her again presently, where she'd come back to give the woman with the fever the drops she was to have every two hours and not a soul to see to it; and I went about with her a little, she pressing me in, for her hands were full that day, and it was raw and sloshy and coming on to storm, so that the world looked dreary. She had medicines for a cough to leave here, and a couple of oranges for an ailing girl there, and an apple for a good child; and there was a bedridden old body to bathe further up; and the long, tangled hair of a woman that was in delirium to comb out and braid, that she might perhaps lie down in comfort; and it was a bitter hour we spent together while she gave the ether to a poor creature dying in convulsions, and brought peace out of all that writhing horror. The roughest of the gang loafing there stepped out into the street or touched their hats now to Miss Provoost, I saw as she went by. They'd come to look at her as a divine providence. They all felt what was this she was doing. Perhaps they didn't know when it would be their turn or their wives' to need her.

We stayed a half-hour or more in the place where she had brought home the boy she'd run over. He was the boy she had the apple for, and she had peppermints for a mumbling old grandmother there was there; and she took care of the woman that was still alive in the dark room—I let her; I couldn't. She had set up a reflector there to brighten it a bit. And she showed the little ten-year-old girl who did the work how to make the porridge tasty; she'd brought the groats, and she sipped some of it herself. I couldn't have swallowed in that room. But I saw what she was doing; it was a sort of sacrament, for the mother had looked at her askance at first, and she was winning her to friend and wiling her, it may be, from the drink in which she would burn up the sense of her trouble, while she sewed and sewed and sewed, and another child threaded the needles. The father was doing time somewhere—he had never done anything else, I mind me. She had brought the boy a picture-book once; he had his hands fine, I saw, and she held him on her knee. "O, no!" she said to the mother, "I'm not at all a missionary. I'm not good enough. And I have hardly anything to give in charity. I'm just a nurse. I've learned how, and I am going round to do only what there is no one else to do."

"Yes," says my mistress, when I told her, "she is breaking the alabaster box."

Well, well, it seemed as if she felt life was not long enough to make up for the time she had lost. In one place we sat down and let a nurse there was there of her providing go out for a breathing spell, and here there was a scalded child to bandage, and here there was a face raw with the king's evil, for word of her seemed to pass in the air. And when it came to the woman with the cancer, and she opened it and was cleansing it and dressing it, "Heart of me!" I whispers. "How ever can you do it? It goes against me just to see it."

"She has to feel it," says Miss Frances. But I must go out on the fire-escape and breathe, I was that faint and sick. "And what are you doing it for?" I cried, when we got outside and turned our steps homeward. "I began it," she said—half under her breath it was—"for the Lord, for the love of the Lord, but now I think sometimes I am doing it for the love of them."

"That's the way I like to hear you talk," says I. The folly of me! She looked at me a moment. "I have heard Betty speak of you," she says—that Betty! "And do you know there is a saying you bring to mind for me? 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'"

Me? Well, well—still I can't say that it wasn't myself brought things to a point, for all. For I was telling Betty of the risks she ran down there with the ill-smelling fevers, and maybe the small-pox, and dear knows what. And that tongue of Betty's is a fire; and so it was that Mrs. Van Cortright had it pat, and was reproaching her sister for the danger she was putting all the household in, through the distemper she might any day bring home. "Then," said Miss Frances, gently, "that ought to settle it. I can conclude the matter of the house down there. I can buy it and renovate it; it was a fine old mansion once. And I can live there with my maid and my three nurses—they are as interested as I."

"What in the world are you talking about?"

"And I've found it hard for some time," Miss Frances went on, "to spend the first half of the days down there and be fit for the last half up here with dinners and operas and"—

"Then why do you do it? Well, I'm thankful to say you haven't the money for this crazy scheme, and I won't let Van Cortright give you one penny!"

"Yes, my own income is enough for that exactly. And I don't doubt that when I've made the settlement down there money will begin to flow in, and I can have other nurses, and help so many, soul and body"—

"Frances, you will disgrace us! Every one will think you are gone mad!" cried Mrs. Van Cortright.

"And many of them said, He hath a devil and is mad," answered Miss Frances.

"Frances," then Mrs. Van Cortright said more gently, "do you really think you could leave us, and all this pleasantness and sumptuousness? Don't you love it?"

"O, yes!" sighed Miss Frances.

"Unless you brought it to me."

"I never should. I would wash my hands of you. I would never see you again!"

"You think so now, Jule, but you would. Very likely you would come down and help me sometimes."

"Don't lay any such flattering unction to your soul. I wouldn't. The idea! And you would never go to the theater, of course, nor the opera. Ciel! Never to hear Manon again! Never to have another dress from Felix! And you love pretty gowns, you know you do!"

"Yes," said Miss Frances.

"And to go afoot. You love horses, Frances!"

"Yes," said Miss Frances again.

"And Newport in summer, and the sea. And the yacht, Frances! And the camp in the deep woods—why, what are you thinking of? To give them all up! And O, the hot weather, the sweltering hot weather in town! The horrible nights when they are sleeping on the sidewalks and in the gutters down there in the Ghetto, and every one is dumb with suffering"—

"I can suffer with them."

"What good is that going to do them! And love," persisted Mrs. Van, "you are counting it out! You don't know what it is! Brinckerhoff loves you—you could love him. In a year's time you would laugh at this brief insanity. Just think what you are giving up—a whole life—home, husband, children"—

"O, you mustn't, Jule! You make me waver. You tempt me!" cries Miss Frances, by that Betty's word of mouth. "You take me up into a high mountain, and O, it is a low moun'ain! For I do love these things and the thought of them. And I love you, O, all of you! And you mustn't cast me off because I see things differently. You must help me, even if our ways part"—

"Betty!" cries the madame then. "Is that you in there? That tiresome lace—will you never have it cleansed?" And she shuts the door in her face.

"It was like the drop-curtain in the theater," said Betty.

"O, Betty!" says I, "and you to say that!" though I won't say there wasn't a twinkle in my eye.

"Do you suppose," says that Betty, the face of her! "that I didn't spot you the other night at Shoreacres, crying for all you was worth?"

"I went to see if it was fit for you to see, Betty," says I, "and Mr. Jo."

"Mr. Jo was up in the gallery with a parcel of the Polytechnic fellers," says that Betty.

"I'll have to look into that!" says I.

I was down at the Three Deeps presently again myself; for some of the dresses of those trimmers of ours, yes, the twins, I'd thought might come handy there. "Wot's dis de loidy was givin' us about a day called Easter?" says the boy down there, the limb that was at the start of all this upset—Billy, his mother called him, but I'd noticed the little rats in the streets called him Cully. "Cheese it, Cully, the cop's comin'!" they cried when he'd jumped into the fountain basin with his clothes on, that dreadful hot day I'd come back to town for a book of the master's.

"Easter," says I, "comes the day but one after tomorrow. Miss Frances will tell you it's the best day of the year."

"Yip," said he, "de best day er de year's any day de loidy comes down ter de Tree Deeps! Dat's me size."

"Is it de day dey gives tings?" asked the girl I was fitting the gown on.

"Hully gee, if 'twas," said the boy, walking round the room on his hands, "I know wot I'd take in mine. I'd have de loidy—she's a peach—come an' live down here where I could do de jobs fer her every blame day, you bet yer sweet life!"

"If I'd heard my Jo swear that way," says I, for it's not all his words I've given you, "I don't know what I'd do."

"A song and dance," says Cully.

Betty came over, after Mrs. Van Cortright's grand musical morning. "I guess its settled," says she. "There's been a lawyer drawing up a deed about a place down there in the Felonies. And I guess it came about this way," says she. "You see Mrs. Van told me I might hear the music, and I was down, and behind the curtain, and I thought I'd lose my breath with the violets festooned in great bunches there, till Thomas let down a window. And there was a settling of silks and chiffons, for the singer was coming, and just before the silence I heard Mr. Brinckerhoff's voice close by. He was standing, tall and dark and handsome, with that spark he has in his eye, leaning over Miss Frances—and there's nothing you can compare her to but just a great, blooming rose—and he was holding her fan, and 'twas plain in his eyes, his smile, his voice, that after his way he worshiped her. 'Never!' he was saying. He was speaking low. 'Let my wife waste herself on the creatures of the slums? Never!' And just then the singer began to sing; and let me tell you I never heard music before! Sweet, sweet, sweet, clear as flutes, voices falling out of the sky, far, far off! And I saw the face of Miss Frances where she stood, and it seemed as if it must be the face of one of those singing voices. And I says to myself, Larks, says I! And you'll see!" says that Betty.

I did It was a clear, blithe morning, with scents of the earth blowing over the city from I don't know where; and I'd have known it was the Easter, even hadn't the streets been so still and the bells swimming on the air, by the high, white light and the sweet fresh smell of the weather. They say, with all the rest that they say, that the sun gives three leaps for joy when he rises on Easter morning. It's my opinion he leaps for joy every morning, except when he looks into the court of the Three Deeps. He couldn't leap for joy looking in there. But, to be sure, he never does! I'd gone down there on the errand of the mistress again. And saving for one broken lily in the hand of a little brown ragamuffin there was no sign of the day down there, and, Sunday or Easter, all the same to them, there was the low thunder of the sewing machine in this room, and the tapping of the last in that, and the scrubbing of the board in the other, as I went by, and all the vile smells were coming out strong, and there was the roar of a fight in the alley, and a dead man—O, well, there's some of us too delicate to hear about the way others have to live—and die.

And I can't say but it hurt me, it hurt me hard, to think of this pretty creature who had every joy there is in life for her own if she chose, coming down here to live in the reek and the filth, and only going about from one fever bed to another the day long and the night long. A costly sacrifice it was. But, O, they needed her, the poor wretches, they needed her! And all at once something filled my eyes, and I longed and ached for a moment, not for the poor wretches, but for myself, that I had no such mighty love as that for which I might joy to make sacrifice. "Yes," said my mistress, when I told her once, "it was the Easter time, and the Lord was rising in your heart, I think."

However, that's neither here nor there. But I toiled up those tilting, shaking stairs in the dark and the dirt, and I came to that upper room where the woman sewed and the little girl threaded the needles and the old grandmother mumbled, and Miss Frances was there before me, in the dark room, binding the last bandage with its cool salve about the poor creature there who was to hold out but a day or two longer. The boy Billy was standing on his head. "Easter's here, an' we'se blowin' of it in!" says he. "We'se got her—de loidy! She's come ter stay, see? Say, dere ain't no stringin' in it! Hope I may never kick a copper if she ain't a-takin' me wid her ter mind de crack!"

The place was clean, the mother was sober, the boy's face was shining. "Easter," mumbled the old grandmother, some chord touched in her memory of a better day, it may be, "the Lord has risen." Well, some say God made the world in six days, and some say he made it in a thousand ages, and I say anyway God made it. And perhaps the Lord would have risen down here in the Felonies if Miss Frances hadn't come there. But anyway Miss Frances came, and the day of the Lord came with her. The Lord had risen.

Miss Frances stepped softly out of the dark room, folding off the apron she wore over the gown that was the color of a plum—she always wore down there the colors to take the eye. Small blame to her if she knew that beauty makes its way—and she looking like a flower! And after a little we went down the stairs, where I always felt to take my life in my hands, and which she was to climb so many a hot day and black night! And we came out on the street, where the sun and the blue sky and the smell of the grass in the air from far-away fields seemed, beside the place we left, like the fore court of heaven. And I saw her face white with the light behind it. "There is so much suffering in the world," she said. "And to be set apart to relieve any portion of it, what a fellowship is that!"

"Then you've settled to it, Miss Frances," I asked.

"O, yes," she said.

"And if you find yourself regretting when the dour days and nights come, with the pain, the poverty, the tiring of it, the unlovely folk?"

"No," she said, "no. They are our Lord's, the poor. He must feel more tenderly to them than to the fortunate, the happy—as a mother feels to her lame child. When I go through the dark streets at night I often feel a great, sweet presence walking with me."

"There's a grand verse in Luke, Miss Frances," whispered I, "that says when you have left home for the kingdom of God's sake, you"—

"O, it is true!" she cried. "Shall receive manifold more in the present time."

"And in the world to come life everlasting," said I.

But for my own part, I don't know, I don't know.

The First Day of the Week

By Rev. Charles Cuthbert Hall, D. D.

I wish to say something about preserving the Easter spirit in our daily life. In every week of our life there stands one day, which all persons agree is unlike the other days of the week. It is the first day. But while all recognize a distinction in the first day of the week, all are not agreed as to the nature of that distinction. To some it is a financial distinction; the banks and the exchanges are closed. To some it is physical; rest for a tired body and mind, more time to sleep and to go out in sunshine. To some it is social; more time to see one's friends. To some it is restriction; a dull, tiresome day, hedged in by church customs. To some it is traditional solemnity; the Sabbath of Sinai reproduced in theory, the objective point being to keep the day holy by stopping ordinary occupations.

It is far from my purpose to discuss these different views of the first day of the week. I would simply state what I believe to be a true view. Sunday is a tradition in every life; in some lives a dull and spiritless tradition, in some lives a frivolous and idle tradition, in some lives a noble and exalting tradition. Our feeling toward Sunday is largely determined by our sense of the meaning of Sunday. If there is in us a broad, clear and constant sense of the meaning of the day, our feeling toward it must bend to a corresponding animation, affection and intelligent delight. To keep Sunday merely because our fathers kept it, or because family sentiment and public sentiment approve it, is to permit thought to tarry far beneath the level it might obtain. But he will not stay on that lower level of thought who will stand on Easter Day as on the summit of a great mountain, and will look off from that hight upon the meaning of Sunday.

I speak as one who passionately loves the Sundays of life; who thinks of them as places of indescribable rest and refreshment in the journey through the world; who rejoices in their approach as times when one is lifted above that which is depressing and mean and exhausting, and is permitted to enjoy a mighty liberty and a grand fellowship with nobleness and strength. When may a lover of Sunday speak so naturally of the day he loves as on Easter Day? Easter Day is the birthday of Sunday as a day of holy gladness in the life of man, and every Easter as it comes marks the beginning of a new year of Sundays in our life. To the Christian the first day of the week is known by that sweetest and best of names, "the Lord's Day." Whatever others may call it, however others may use it, to him it is Christ's Day.

A fact came to light on the first day of the week, a fact which transfigured the life of a little handful of people in a corner of the earth, and which is transfiguring the life of the world. For that little handful of people the week before had ended in darkness and despair. They had had a Leader whose personality had bound them to himself. They had believed in him with all their hearts, had left all to follow him, had become convinced that he was the Messiah, had confidently expected him to establish a kingdom. Instead of seeing their expectations gloriously verified they had seen that Leader seized, insulted, tortured, tried, condemned, executed, and with their own hands rescuing his maltreated body from the publicity of the cross they had laid it in the grave.

O, that Sabbath after the crucifixion, that seventh day after the Passover, that last ebb of a miserable week! What essence of failure and disappointment it left behind as it closed in utter darkness! But the first day of the week they went to that grave, and the stone was rolled away. They found not the body of their Leader but angels, who said: "He is not here. He is risen." Then came, ere that first marvelous day of the new week had ended, a great triad of evidences that Christ was risen indeed. First, in the dawn-light, Mary saw him and heard him call her by her name; then toward evening he was seen again by two of them, at whose side he walked, causing their hearts to burn within them as he opened to them the Scriptures, and making himself known in the breaking of bread; and then at night, when the doors were shut where they were assembled, he came again, stood in their midst, showed them his hands and side, breathed on them and said, "Peace be unto you; as my Father hath sent me, so send I you."

When the day came round once more with it came back to them the vision of a risen Christ. Again he was with them, where all could see and hear him; again he stood in the midst, breathing the benediction of eternal peace. And yet again, years and years afterward, when the first day of the week had become the rallying point of the Christian society, once again Christ stamped it as divine by choosing it as the occasion of his brightest self-revelation. "I was in the spirit," said St. John, "on the Lord's Day, and heard behind me a great voice as of a trumpet, saying, 'I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last; he that liveth and was dead and is alive forevermore.'" In these self-revelations of the risen Christ Sunday was born as the great "festum," the joyous day of Christians. No commandment to keep it was thundered forth. Its growth into a permanent institution was an illustration of the Lord's own words, "If ye love me, ye will keep my commandments." As the day has become one of universal observance in many nations as a rest day, wherein large numbers of people are released from business, it has, of course, been necessary to have the civil government make suitable laws, which we must all obey, for maintaining the order and peace of society, but every Christian should joyfully remember that this institution of the Lord's Day sprang out of love, not out of law. It is not a grievous commandment; it is a joyous consecration. It is not compulsory; it is voluntary, and as such we believe it is especially dear to Christ.

In the light of thoughts like these, what is the spirit of the day? What is the attitude of mind in which we may approach and enter the first day of the week? Four words stand for me like angels at the gateway of each first day of the week, inviting me to enter. Those four words are consecration, communion, worship, freedom.

Consecration, the freshness of the morning. Often, on Sunday morning, when I arise, I think of the scene in the garden as the risen Saviour took his first steps in the early sunshine. How marvelous it must have seemed even to him who made the world to rise from his dark tomb and to come out amidst the dewy grass, the sparkling leaves, the flowers, the birds, the sunshine, the breeze; to breathe in the delicious sense of life and strength, to realize that suffering, humiliation and death were over and past forever—forever. Can one who thinks of this forbear the longing to be consecrated, renewed, refreshed as with the very power of his resurrection, leaving behind all that is of darkness, insincerity and selfishness, and rising on the first day to begin life over again?

And communion is another of these words. Fellowship with the risen One! He sought out his friends on that very first day, to have fellowship with them. In his risen life he showed the same joy in fellowship as before the crucifixion, and it becomes an unspeakably dear thought that our fellowship with him can be renewed in all strength and intimacy on the first day of the week. Perhaps the week past has been teazing and distressing; earthly things went contrary to our hopes and expectations; cares seemed to bank up on either hand like great billows breaking over us and almost sweeping us from our footing; we grew very weary, we lost our hold on Christ, we became downhearted and desperate. Then dawned upon us once more the dear first day of the week, and all was changed. We recovered our fellowship with him, we renewed our communion, we found him meeting us amidst our cares with his calm strength and his glad greeting, "All hail."

And worship is another of those great words—worship, a necessity of man's life, an act of which we cannot deprive ourselves without maltreating and wounding our life. How strange that so many look upon worship as a wearisome duty, to be discharged no oftener than public opinion demands! How strange that men and women can suppose it possible to live complete lives without worship! Worship is a law of our nature as creatures made in God's image, and when in our busy lives comes the beautiful and gracious first day of the week, glorious in all its resurrection memories and hopes, we love it as a day of worship, we gather around our risen Lord, we bow at his feet, we pray him to abide with us, we know that in worshiping him we are fulfilling the deepest law of our own being.

Yet one other word stands at the portals of the first day of the week, liberty. The inspiration of this day is its joyous liberty, the liberty which is born of love. It is not the Jewish Sabbath, nor a Christian substitute for a Jewish Sabbath. It is not a day of bondage to tradition, a day whose meaning is realized and whose use is fulfilled in a stern routine of ordinances, resting like a yoke on the neck of life. It is a day of spontaneous expression, a day of gladness and affection, a day whose uses love and love only can control. No one can truly be said to keep this day who does not love and honor the risen Lord. It is the Lord's Day, and only they who care for him care for it. The laws of the State and the public sentiment of an orderly community may, to some extent, limit those open violations of propriety which are classified under the stern Jewish name of Sabbath-breaking, but no law, no public sentiment, can make one person keep holy the Lord's Day. Love is the only law that sanctifies the first day of the week, and the law of love is the perfect law of liberty. Therefore, my heart goes out into this day because there is no bondage in it, nothing but joy and rest and gladness and the perfect love that casteth out fear. Those who keep it in love keep it in sacredness.

O, holy and happy Sundays, how your sunlight streams across the path of memory. How the Easter spirit lives forever in you, consecrating our daily life! How your sacred, untrammeled freedom has broadened our life, making us realize the liberty wherewith Christ has set us free!

The good news is true—once the Redeemer tasted death for us, now he lives to help us live. His salute to us is from the other side of death. We will answer it with life like his—strong because trustful and obedient, rich in goodness and sympathy, brightening the world.—E. T. FAIRBANKS.

THE PLACE OF CRUCIFIXION

BY HON. SELAH MERRILL

The country where our Lord lived and died has always for the Christian a wonderful and sacred interest. The town where he was born, the mountain home of his youth and early manhood, the beautiful lake on whose shores he taught, the roads he trod when going up to "the city of the Great King," quiet Bethany, his resting place, and lovely Olivet, whence his tearful eyes overlooked Jerusalem—these are all well known and are yearly visited by thousands of devout persons who hope thus to be brought more fully into the presence of Christ. Why cannot we visit also the place of his crucifixion and burial? The world is ignorant of the spot where Moses was buried and where Paul died, a fact true likewise of many saints of Bible times. I am fully persuaded that in these instances it is God's own hand that draws the veil before our eyes. He brings us so near the awful scenes that we can hear the voices from Calvary and the tomb, but for the wisest reasons he does not permit us to see the places themselves. This is all true; still it does not prevent us from asking, in all earnestness and eagerness, if anything is actually known as to the spot where Christ was crucified and buried?

We have New Testament authority that Christ was crucified outside the walls of Jerusalem. Armed with this fact, some travelers, on visiting Jerusalem and finding the Holy Sepulcher in the middle of the city, assert, "This cannot be the place of crucifixion." But, in reality, their objection does not hold, for the present walls were built in 1540; therefore, they have nothing to do with the question. Our Lord was crucified in A. D. 30, the sepulcher was discovered in A. D. 325 and the church which Constantine ordered to be erected over the place was dedicated in A. D. 336. Between the first two dates are three full centuries lacking eight years. During this period the Christians had left the city, the Jews had been banished from it, it had withstood two terrible sieges and been twice destroyed—under Titus, A. D. 70, and under Hadrian, A. D. 134—new walls and public buildings had been erected by Hadrian—time enough and vicissitudes enough to have obliterated everything that belonged to the city of Herod. Hence we find Constantine declaring that the place of crucifixion had been long unknown and its discovery is stated by him to be purely miraculous, and all the circumstances connected with the discovery are of the same character. It is alleged that a sepulcher was found containing three crosses, one of which proved to be the "true cross" because miracles were at once performed with it. In the soil of Palestine wood, and even bones, decay in a very few years.

This is the "evidence" on which the claim of the Holy Sepulcher is based, between A. D. 30 and A. D. 336, and the same is true of the period from A. D 336 to our own time. There is not a particle of evidence, in the shape of documents, inscriptions, historical facts, to substantiate this claim. Its advocates, when pressed for reasons, invariably respond, "Constantine must have known the correct site." They have absolutely nothing else to say.

"Without the gate," that is, outside the wall. At the date of the crucifixion Jerusalem had two walls on the north side, the east, south and west sides being protected by the first wall. Why may not this have been meant? Simply for the reason that on these three sides the hills were so abrupt that the slopes could not be used for any purpose. The third wall was built after the death of Christ. The second wall is the one intended. One end of this was at the Tower of Antonia. It has long been known and its identity is not disputed by any one. Here, then, is a clew, good so far as it goes. The other end of this wall has been in dispute for generations, but in 1885 I was so fortunate as to find it. One hundred and twenty feet of it exist under the east side of the Grand New Hotel, and it has been universally admitted as the long missing end of the second wall. This discovery was an important and positive gain.

The next problem is to unite the two ends by a line which shall follow the course of the second wall. If this could be done so as to exclude the Holy Sepulcher its claim might be considered as established. But unfortunately no ancient remains have been found on the line thus arbitrarily laid down.

The matter does not rest here. In the north part of the city there are at four different points sections of an ancient wall of Jewish workmanship. Starting with the known ends as described, I lay down the line of the second wall so as to cover these four points, consequently I have six sections of wall, all of Jewish masonry and of the same period. This line coincides exactly with Josephus's description of the second wall. It seems to me that I am dealing with facts and not with theories. I have taken scores of people to these points, showed them the stones, the plan and read Josephus's description, and no one has ever failed of being convinced. Among these persons were three engineers of high rank, and after examination they said, "There is no doubt about this being the line of the second wall." The Holy Sepulcher, being far within this wall, cannot, of course, be the site of the crucifixion.

Why then, it is asked, is not this view universally accepted? Because many people make their faith in the Holy Sepulcher a matter of religion. This feeling I cannot appreciate. Greeks, Latins and the more infatuated of the Anglicans believe implicitly in the Holy Sepulcher, because "the church declares it to be the true site." With them argument is out of the question. Personally, I have no preference for one site above another. I have no preconceived theory to be either substantiated or overthrown. The great fact that Christ died to save sinners has the same significance to me whether his death took place here or there. I approach the subject with the utmost reverence. My opponents say, "This is the tradition of the church," and stop there; I gaze upon piles of Jewish masonry and ask the meaning of them. As they contradict the tradition I must reject it.

The reader may understand that two distinct questions are involved—we may show that the Holy Sepulcher has no claim whatever to be considered the site of Calvary, and still never be able to demonstrate the second question, namely, where Calvary should be located. The hill above Jeremiah's Grotto, about 300 yards north of the Damascus gate, is now generally called the Calvary Hill. It rises forty feet above the surrounding country and at its foot there is a tomb. This cannot be the tomb of Christ, but there are many arguments for thinking that the hill itself is the place of crucifixion.

Eternity, which cannot be far off, is my one strong city. I look into it fixedly now and then. All terrors about it seem to me superfluous. The universe is full of love and of inexorable sternness and veracity, and it remains forever true that God reigns. Patience, silence, hope.—CARLYLE.

EDDY OR FLOOD

BY REV. A. J. F. BEHRENDS, D. D.

In The Congregationalist for March 11 an article from my pen appeared under the heading Is It Only an Eddy, or Is It More? It was received by the editor as timely, with the editorial statement, however, that he did not personally share in the apprehensions expressed. The following extract will serve to show the nature and scope of the writer's judgment of the theological situation:

> The doctrine of the Trinity is reduced to a form of logic. The incarnation is so formulated as to reduce it to the pantheistic statement of a universal indwelling of God in all men. Inspiration is reduced to intuition. Atonement dwindles down into a rhetorical expression. Expiation and propitiation have become figures of speech. Our ranks seem to be honeycombed with universalism and annihilationism. The reality of the fall is boldly denied, and the most extreme doctrines of natural evolution are openly advocated in our pulpits. Sin is declared to be only the remnant of our animal ancestry, which we are gradually sloughing off. The revolutionary theories of Wellhausen are invested with infallible authority, and the narratives of the Old Testament are reduced to a mass of fables and forgeries.

As after four weeks or more I read the above extract I confess that I am myself startled by its vehemence. It was a terrible indictment. But I knew what I was saying and my proofs are at hand. I ought, however, in justice to my brethren and to myself, to add that it was not meant to be a sweeping charge. It was not a wail but a note of alarm. I knew but few against whom I believed the charge would hold, and I very much doubt whether even they would plead guilty. I cannot close my eyes to the fact that principles have been advocated whose logical conclusions are evaded. And I believe that many are disturbed by facts which they cannot harmonize with the views in which they were trained and which they have no desire to repudiate. The poisonous shoots have only just broken through the sod, but they will grow very fast and the plowshare cannot be put under them too soon. Let me speak, then, not as censor but as brother.

My article called forth numerous replies. Some of these appeared in the issue of The Congregationalist for March 25, covering nearly three full pages, with three columns to the page; and the editorial comment declared that the published replies supported his previously expressed judgment that my apprehensions were groundless. It was intimated that Brooklyn did not command a sufficiently wide view, while at Boston it seemed clear that my eyes had been deceived by a local fog.

The replies cannot here be reproduced, but they can easily be read by any one who desires to do so. If they inspire any reassurance, the reader must be easily satisfied. Nothing more damaging has appeared anywhere in forty years than the admissions, painful and otherwise, in the reading matter of these three pages. The concessions are simply appalling. Some glory in the change which has come over our theological thinking, and declare it not to be an eddy but a current. The new view of inspiration is illustrated by the statements that "fables are not necessarily lies," and that "Æsop's cunningly devised tale of the fox and grapes has been an enduring vehicle of truth." That crack lets in a good deal of light. The Scriptural doctrine of the fall of man is declared to be "a child's sketch, a picture of dramatic situation," all of which, of course, we have now outgrown, and the story only outlines "the contrast within the man himself."

There is an ominous silence on the doctrine of retribution. That is quietly shelved. There is a frank declaration that the structure of faith rests "primarily upon Christ, and not upon Scripture or any creed." The italics are mine, and it certainly is a very novel doctrine that we have a knowledge of Christ apart from, and independent of, Scripture, so that one may be loyal to Christ and discount the Scriptures upon which he set the seal of his infallible authority. Another boastingly writes from the Central West that the doctrines which I said were being ignored and discounted had been preached and "practiced," and the Old Testament narratives "believed explicitly and implicitly," until Congregational ministers began to "flounder" in these communities. A young man in the first year of his active work writes that the "times are perplexing," and that we are in "great danger of losing our power as preachers of righteousness. Unless we can have a primitive gospel to proclaim we shall become powerless." That young man is headed right and for him I have no fear. Let him keep straight on.

Another plainly declares that I have "voiced the prevailing sentiment of the pastors and churches in Pennsylvania," and that it is "full time to get out of the fog and preach a clear, positive gospel." And still another, writing from Connecticut, says: "For ten years I have painfully noticed the drift. To stand on plain, evangelical ground is to be considered unprogressive. I find fellow-ministers who are annihilationists, universalists. The fall is denied. There is no Biblical doctrine of sin, and so no redemption."

A hundred letters are at my elbow, from the East and the West, from city and country, from pastors and laymen, from men and women. I will not quote from them. There is no need of it. But they all tell the same story, and there are in them statements which are more startling than anything quoted above. I am content to appeal to what has been spread before the public to prove that the charge of pessimism brought against me is not true, and that I have simply turned on the light upon a situation already sufficiently alarming.

Of course, my letters are from men and women who regret what they report. And this is one hopeful feature of the situation. The theological eddy has not become a flood. It has not caught the majority. Pulpits and pews, for the most part, still stand by the old faith. But there is unrest and alarm. New views, subversive of the faith of the fathers, and, as I think, subversive of all Biblical faith, have not only gained entrance but are being boldly proclaimed and disseminated. It is time to begin the discussion, and in the friction of free and fraternal speech to strip the question to its merits. It is time to stop and inquire where we are. It is time for great and earnest searching of heart.

It may seem a cruel thing to do, this throwing of a bombshell into the Congregational camp by a Congregational pastor, and by one who was not born and bred in its communion. But a pastorate of more than twenty-one years in two Congregational churches made me feel that I had earned my right to speak, and I cannot believe that any one suspects me of insincere and unfraternal motives. I asked my anxious question because I loved Congregationalism. I asked it plainly and bluntly, because I felt that whatever the truth might be it should be known. And I am not sorry that I asked it, because now it will have to be considered and answered. That broadside in The Congregationalist has let the daylight in, and that is what is needed. I am content to wait.

But will not this discredit Congregationalism? No, it will not. The theological eddy is not a denominational one; it is universal. The Episcopalians are honeycombed with the new criticism and the new theology. A trenchant article in the Standard of Chicago, for March 11, shows that the Baptists are as badly off as are we. There is the clash of swords in the Methodist camp. The Presbyterians have their hands full and the pendulum of heresy trials swings back and forth. First it was Robertson Smith, then it was Professor Briggs, and now Dr. John Watson's turn has come. The pot cannot call the kettle black. The theological measles have broken out in all the denominations and there is no place where we can go to escape the infection; unless we go to Rome, and that means giving up our Bible to the pope. That we will not do, and so every man of us may as well stay where he is and fight it out.

Nor must I be understood as advocating a blind return to what is somewhat sneeringly called the "traditional theology." I have a great and growing respect for that theology. I am still an earnest reader of Calvin's Institutes, I have not outgrown Jonathan Edwards. But I do not worship these men. They were not infallible. Nor are the great creeds authoritative. We are not in bondage to synods and councils. Thought must be free, and the interpretations of the past are not to be accepted as trammels upon the most fearless scrutiny. But, one is our Master, even Christ.

Everybody seems to grant that, and that is hopeful. Loyalty to Christ is emphasized as the one canon of theological construction. If any one knows how I can know His mind, and what he would have me believe, except by the Scriptures which he always honored, I wish he would tell me. I should be eager to examine these new sources. A doctrine of Scripture, which sunders the Testaments and which throws Paul's testimony out of court, as is done by not a few, is the one thing which I cannot accept, without conscious repudiation of the authority of Christ. I have noticed that recent commentaries on the epistle to the Romans are marked by a return to the older theology. Paul, confessedly, held it and preached it; but we are told that the Pauline epistles are steeped in Rabbinical conceptions, and that these must be eliminated from the primitive gospel. I have tried to do that and found that I might as well throw Paul into the ash barrel.

For me, at least, the Pauline doctrine is elementary, and must be accepted in its integrity. Translate it, if you will, into modern speech, but the translation must not be a repudiation. There I draw the line. Let us have a reconstructed theology, a theology for the times, but the theology must be Scriptural in its every fiber. I will have none other, and I will be hospitable to none other. I am not pleading for a return to the old method of "proof-texts," which were often a most incongruous mixture; but the Bible remains for me the only documentary source of Christian doctrine, and no man gains my ear who speaks in any other tongue. And I am sure that pulpits and pews will stand with me there. We want to know what God has said through the holy oracles. That ends it!

Does any one charge me with effrontery? Are there any who curl their lips in scorn at my self-conceit? Are great names set against me, names of men, on both sides of the sea, who are my equals in sincerity and earnestness, my superiors in scholarship and influence? I am not measuring swords. I am not posing as theological censor. I do not care whether men are old school, or new school, or of no school at all; whether they are Calvinists or Arminians, Hopkinsians or Bushnellites; whether they train under Albert Barnes or Charles Hodge. I believe in the new light which breaks forth from the Scripture. But it must come from the Scripture. That is my sole contention. I cannot agree to the new dictum that things may be plainly taught in Scripture which we need not believe, and that we may introduce into our theology doctrines on which the Scriptures are silent. All that the Bible clearly teaches is essential. All that the Bible does not clearly teach has no place in Christian faith. If that be effrontery I must bear the charge in silence. That is the platform of our common Protestantism, and by that test men and books must stand or fall.

I am not afraid of the issue. The Congregational churches, if I have read their history aright, will never accept any but a Scriptural theology, no matter from whence it comes. The Congregational churches will never consent to have the credibility of the Old and New Testaments impugned and their doctrinal authority undermined. Paul will never be displaced from the seat to which Christ exalted him. He cannot be pushed aside in the attempt to formulate the so-called "theology of Christ." The Congregational churches will conclude that Paul understood Christ and his gospel better than the doctors of the nineteenth century.

But this survival and revival of the Scriptural faith will not come without a struggle. We have been on the defensive long enough. The camel is forcing its body into our tent. We must take the aggressive. I have gone through the labyrinths of the Wellhausen criticism, and of its modifications. It is hopeless confusion. I have gone through the "revolutionized theology." I have read its books. They are as dry and sapless as chips. There is no power in them.

Give me, with all its faults, the theology of Augustine and Anselm and Luther and Calvin and Jonathan Edwards for that theology has changed the face of the earth, has made sinners tremble, has made stalwart saints, has promoted revivals of religion and has girdled the world with missionary stations! And the great doctrines of the fall of man, of the deity of Jesus Christ, of the immutable justice of God, of the majesty of the moral law, of reconciliation by the blood of the cross, of regeneration by the Holy Ghost and of the final judgment with its issues of eternal life and eternal death, will survive the present partial eclipse, and come forth once more clear as the sun, fair as the moon and terrible as an army with banners!

It is not a flood; it is only an eddy! But we must stem it!

IMPRESSIONS OF LIFE AT THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

II.

BY G. P. M.

Nine out of ten present day pilgrims to Washington go straight as a hawk to its prey in pursuit of the newly revealed glories of the library of Congress, and to most of them it comes as a revelation, no matter how much they have traveled in Europe or read about this particular structure. In size and adaptation for its use it surpasses any building of the kind which exists. When, in addition to this, it is understood that it is so far from being a "job" that it was completed within the time limit set by Congress in 1888, and for about $140,000 less than the original limit of cost, and that fifty of the best American painters and sculptors, working in entire harmony with each other and the managing architect, have decorated the building in a lavish yet artistic and inspiring way, it will be realized that in this home for the library of Congress, this depository of all works copyrighted in this country, the American people have an educational institution the potency of which they do not begin to appreciate now.

This building proves that we have honest administrators of public tasks in this country, the Capitol at Albany to the contrary notwithstanding. It reveals conclusively that we have sculptors and artists able to perform great tasks and competent to form national art ideals. It demonstrates, as did the buildings of the White City in 1893, the majesty and beauty that follow unity of purpose and action when artists—major and minor—federate and sink self that beauty may endure.

Not until the stacks begin to be filled with books, not until the splendidly lighted and adorned galleries for the display of engravings and precious examples of the bookmaker's art are in use, not until the reading-room in the vast rotunda is the resort of book-seekers as well as sight-seers, will the soul fully take possession of its beautiful body. But, when it does, God pity the American, be he ever so illiterate or brutish, blasé or traveled, who can "enter in and walk about Zion" and come away unmoved and not less sordid and prouder of his American citizenship than when he went in. Costly it is but not extravagant, and if all our revenue were expended as beneficently thousands of parasites in human form, leeches on the body politic, would die of inanition. Flawless it is not, for its creators were mortals, not gods. But it is a building which honors its donors, its creators, and its tenants, animate or inanimate.

With such a building as this completed, with the beautiful new Cochran Art Gallery revealing old treasures in a light so perfect that they almost seem new, with the nation pledged, as it were, never to permit the construction of a public building on any other plan or by any other method than the one just crowned with honor, it is plain that, as the years go on, Washington, like Paris, may become the great art center of the nation, for all must believe that some day our legislators will vote a grant to a national art gallery to-be, quite as readily as they now pass resolutions breathing war or as they vote the annual appropriations for seeds.

George Washington dreamed of a time when the national capital would be the site of a national university supported by Federal revenue. There are those today who not only believe that such should be the fact, but they are also actively at work seeking to compass it. Certain it is that there are collections of books, documents, apparatus and scientific data in Washington which are unique in scope and value and ever must be, and slowly but surely a circle of men of highest attainments has gathered there as our Federal activities have expanded, men whose official duties are not so arduous but that they leave time for just such service as Hon. Carroll D. Wright, United States Commissioner of Labor, is rendering now at the new Catholic University. Certain it is, too, that not only are the Catholics already on the ground with a broadly planned, puissant young university, but so are the Methodists (led by Bishop Hurst) with the American University, and there are rumors of like intentions on the part of Protestant Episcopalians, while Columbian University, founded by Baptists, is not prepared to give up its primacy without a struggle.

One who visits the Catholic University, meets its professors and studies the type of student there, comes away impressed with the high standard of its founders, their breadth of purpose, the virility and courtesy of the men one meets, and the culpability of Protestants who affect either to ignore or despise the life and purpose of such men or such an institution. To do so is both foolish and wicked. John Fiske is a foeman whom few care to joust with, yet Professor Shahan of this university has done it recently in a most vigorous, skillful fashion, as all may see who care to read the last number of the university quarterly bulletin. Professor Shahan is a splendid specimen of the stalwart, refined Irish-American. To one who has known of and read Maurice F. Egan for many years, it is a pleasure to find him in his proper niche at last, interpreting English and American literature to men of diverse nationalities, and ever insisting that no man is so base as he who prostitutes gifts of observation, expression or thought to produce immoral or unmoral literature.

One feels rather than hears that the present is a time at the Catholic University when the wounds made by Bishop Keane's summary removal are still open, and that his former subordinates and the new rector, Dr. Conaty, are all "feeling for position," as it were. Reconciliation to the event will come in time, but until it does neither professors nor rector can do their normal work. Dr. Conaty's place would not be a sinecure even were all serene, for much of the annual revenue of the university has to be solicited each year. But he seems to be bearing the burdens bravely and gaining ground slowly.

Kind fortune led me into the august presence of the Supreme Court of the United States in time to hear arguments of cases as typical of this era as could well be imagined—cases involving interpretation of the interstate commerce law and the tenure of a grant of monopoly in street railroad franchises made some years since by the legislature of Indiana to an Indianapolis corporation. Compared with the audiences which formerly gathered to hear arguments respecting slavery or the issues that grew out of the Civil War, the crowds I saw were small, and what size they had was due chiefly to the fact that ex-President Benjamin Harrison was one of the counsel for the monopoly. Lucid, thoroughly grounded in principles and facts, dignified, persuasive, he argued ably for his client. But at least one hearer wished that necessity, assumed or real, had not driven him into the arena of professional life again, or if so that he had taken care to be on the side representing the many, not the few. Too great scrupulousness in this respect cannot be exercised by lawyers, especially those who return to private practice exalted in prestige and value to their clients by honors derived from popular suffrage.

One seldom gets nearer the seat of more power than is lodged in the nine justices who make up our Supreme Court. It is unique. No other court in Christendom has anything like it. That which five or more of them declare to be the intent of any law determines its intent and its legality stands or falls by their comparison of its intent with the written Constitution. Neither the people nor their legislative and executive officials can reverse a decision once rendered by the Court, save by slow processes involving change of personnel. How vital to the perpetuity of such a power in a democracy must be a popular conviction that it is exercised by men of stainless character! Fortunately, such has usually been the case.

To a Congregationalist it affords pleasure to find, at least, two sons of Congregational clergymen now on the Supreme Court bench, Justices Field and Brewer. Justice Brewer is most loyal to the church of his fathers. Pastor Newman of the First Church finds in him a stanch lay helper, and few as are his hours for non professional labor or rest Justice Brewer finds time each Sunday to teach the Bible to a class of adults. The Sunday I chanced to hear him he discussed a portion of the narrative of the Sermon on the Mount in a way that would have grieved Count Tolstoi or Professor Herron. But it commended itself to most who heard it, doubtless. Justice Brewer is not a literalist and he refuses to abrogate common sense or ignore the results of human experience. Hence, if any impecunious Washington tramp expects that by asking for Justice Brewer's vest he will secure a suit of spring clothes, or that by slapping the Justice on the left cheek he will secure an opportunity to smite him on the right and withal avoid the lock-up, then we fear a period of disillusionment awaits him.

Classes for the study of Robert Browning are not so common anywhere, not even in the vicinity of Boston, that it will be untimely to call attention to the fact that during the past winter Rev. Dr. S. M. Newman of our First Church has been interpreting Browning to a mixed class of youths and adults, in number more than 100, who have come regularly and hungrily to be fed. Not much is said about the class. It is not advertised. Nevertheless, outsiders seek it out and pay for the privilege of attending. The success of the venture proves that Browning's message wins if it is heard; and it demonstrates that a pastor fitted to lead such a class has few better ways of inspiring his young people to lead the higher life.

Yet love will dream and faith will trust
(Since He who knows our need is just)
That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.
Alas for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress trees!
Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play!
Who hath not learned, in hours of faith,
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That life is ever lord of death,
And love can never lose its own!

"WE MUST BE SPIRITUAL"

BY REV. GEORGE R. LEAVITT, D.D., BELOIT, WIS.

In New York, Boston and Cincinnati Mr. Moody has been addressing himself to Christians in a series of remarkable sermons. The influence of his earnest and continuous appeals has reached widely. He has had some things to say upon Biblical criticism, upon the second advent, upon altruism (if he has used more vernacular language), upon Christian morality. But the dominant note in his addresses has been an appeal for spirituality. We have recognized the old message once more, intensely earnest, aflame with conviction. We must be spiritual. We may fall from clearness of view as to the literal truth of the story of Jonah, as to the second coming of Chist, as to the danger and the sinfulness of being very rich. All these lapses are serious. But there is one which is more serious. We may fall from spirituality.

Mr. Moody has found many of us fallen from spirituality. Some confess it. It would bless the souls of many others if they too would confess it. It has been a noticeable coincidence that we have been studying together this winter the opening chapters of the Acts. From chapter to chapter we have had the reiterations of the same great, searching, thrilling, divine message: We must be spiritual. Peter must be and the apostles, Stephen and the deacons, Barnabas, Saul and the converts. Mr. Moody must, and we, too, average, ordinary Christians. Many of us have the renewed conviction. But shall we be spiritual in a new experience? Will this be the result? Many have been awakened and have formed new purposes. How many will be effectively changed? This is one answer: All those who in defining that word "must," as an experience, distinguish two great motives—compulsion and impulsion.

Some Christians feel a new compulsion, they acknowledge anew the one, true type of a consecrated life and its claims. They feel that they must realize it. It is a duty. And resolutely, once more, they set themselves to be spiritual. They take new petitions into their prayers. They discipline themselves with new, spiritual exercises. This is well. But they want something more; they will be apt, presently, to weary of a process which is only a noble form of the dead lift of duty. The process will be spiritually exhausting. Their experience presently will seem unreal. After a little many of these will give up their effort, and secretly claim: "We cannot be spiritual. The motive is inadequate."

It is true, the motive of compulsion is inadequate to make one a spiritual Christian —painfully, drearily inadequate. But there is another motive which is accessible to all, and which some will now experience. It is impulsion. Compulsion is powerful—the convictions of duty, self-interest, fear. It has effected wonderful things in the history of religion. Impulsion is not simply powerful, it is irresistible. In a Bible class a woman asked, concerning Peter in the scene before the council, when he said: "We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard," "Was he compelled?" "No," replied the teacher, "he was moved by the Spirit. He was impelled." When Paul wrote: "The love of Christ constraineth us . . . that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again," he was moved from within. He was not compelled. He was impelled.

When the crew of the Jeannette put forth such stupendous efforts to escape from the Northern ice fields, they were compelled by frost and night and death. But that rich Englishman left behind them, who had been led to bury himself in the Alaskan wilderness to give the gospel to the natives till he had gathered about him a Christian community of 2,000 converts, was impelled. The love of Christ constrained him.

In that remarkable story, John Inglesant, is an account of a man who had an absorbing desire to realize the person of Christ—that is, to be a spiritual Christian. He went to a Romish priest, who directed him to abandon society and teach little children. When he declined the good priest was much disappointed. But he said, tenderly, "I believe you will choose some service, for you love him." He knew the power of that great impulsion. It lays necessity upon men to preach the gospel, to live the gospel.

Perhaps a helpful clew has now been given to some one who has been awakened, who sees in a new view the glory of the Christian life as its spirituality, is convinced anew of his own deficiencies and is saying, "I must be spiritual." It is a simple suggestion: Seek to see Christ, to be conscious of the constraint of his love, to be set apart in a new self-surrender to him. He is the center in religion. The Holy Spirit will make him real to you. Jesus said: "He shall take of mine, and shall show it unto you." Pray for, and, if it be necessary, wait for, a new experience of love, so that you may find Paul's exclamation rising to your lips: "The love of Christ constraineth me," or this other expression, which is made the title of this article, which may thus come to mean as much to you as it has to one to whom, as a confession and aspiration, it has entered into all his prayers.

A gentleman said to his friend: "I have just heard a young leader in a Christian Endeavor convention speak from this text, 'We must be spiritual.' It was a very tender address. Throughout it this sentence continually occurred as a refrain—'We must be spiritual.' It thrilled me as I listened. I felt as he felt." He paused, then with a smile and eyes swimming with tears, he repeated the words once more, "Yes, we must be spiritual."

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, APRIL 9

Miss Alice M. Buswell, in connection with 1 Thess. 5: 5–24, spoke of the great need of more of the spirit of Christ in the life, that the wonderful opportunity which presents itself to Christians, so much in the world as they are, may be appreciated and improved, and that the possibility which is theirs of flooding the world with light may be realized.

Mrs. Thompson spoke of this lack as accounting for the frequent conviction that what one does amounts to little, and of the universal need of prayer in this direction. Miss Miller quoted Daniel Webster, who, when asked what he considered his greatest thought, answered, "My responsibility," adding, "There is only one greater word and that is God."

Mrs. Kellogg spoke of the value of self-renunciation in strengthening character and of the duty of making all subordinate to the kingdom of God. The devotional exercises were led by Miss Buswell, Mrs. Purington, Mrs. Strong, Mrs. Thompson, Miss Rice and Miss Lamson.

An interesting letter was read from Miss Abbott of Bombay, describing the condition of affairs in that city. Mrs. Winsor of Sirur, writing at the same time, rejoices that the plague had not then reached their county, but bewails the famine and famine prices for food. In connection with this very embarrassment, new opportunities had opened to preach to large audiences, and she says, "I believe that God means by all these providences to lead the people to himself," and she begs, "O, pray for us that faith shall grow brighter as the days go on."

The conflict of testimony between Dr. Jameson and Sir John Willoughby, given before the Transvaal raid investigating committee last week, was sensational, but Dr. Jameson's assertion that neither he nor Willoughby had imperial sanction for the raid seemed to stand. British acts and words now indicate that a war with the Transvaal is expected, yea, courted, even will be forced, if necessary. Yet there is every reason to believe that all recent troubles in South Africa have been due to "money-grubbing, sordid speculations," and that Britain will find it no child's play to defeat the Boers.

In and Around Chicago

The Election

The results, although anticipated, are yet painful to lovers of good municipal government. Mayor-elect Harrison was nominated by the Democratic Machine; the campaign was fought on a platform which opposed civil service, advocated open saloons and large freedom for vice. Opposed to him were Mr. Hessing, late postmaster, who resigned an office in which he had done well to make a useless attempt to win the mayoralty; Mr. Harlan, who claimed to be a reformer, as did Mr. Hessing, and promised to continue the civil service, prevent corruption of every sort in the city government, surround himself with good men as advisers and helpers, secure proper remuneration for franchises, in short, make an ideal mayor; and Judge Sears, a man of worthy character and fitted for the high office. True he was nominated by the Republican Machine, but only because the Machine dared not nominate a bad man. The opposition was compact, wisely directed and tremendously in earnest. Its victory is claimed as a victory against McKinleyism, civil service and for free silver. In fact, it is the result of a protest which a great many people thought they were making against the Republican Machine, and of the determination of almost 70,000 voters, fully 60,000 of them Republicans, not to vote at all while a few men are prominent in the councils of the Republican party in Chicago. Mr Harrison may make a better mayor than a good many fear. His post-election statements are more encouraging than his campaign statements. But with a majority of eight in the common council it looks as if the old gang had returned to power, and as if the worst days of our most corrupt administrations were upon us again. But we live in the hope that two years hence voters who really desire honesty in the city hall may be able to unite on a single candidate, and bring about that improvement in municipal control for which so many are anxious.

A Good Day for Some Chicago Churches

Sunday, April 4, Dr. D. F. Fox preached his fifth anniversary sermon. California Avenue Church, when he became its pastor, was deeply in debt and discouraged. During his service Dr. Fox has received nearly six hundred persons into fellowship, the majority on confession of faith, and has gathered funds for the building of an attractive house of worship with an audience-room seating eight hundred and worth not less than $45,000. The Sunday school overruns its accommodations. All departments of Christian work are well organized and the congregation is thoroughly harmonious and united in their pastor. Sunday morning Dr. Fox was permitted to announce that a friend had given $2,500 for a pipe organ, the only piece of furniture still lacking, and that it would be in its place for use Easter Sunday. This announcement was wholly unexpected and filled the congregation with such joy that it rose to its feet and sang the Doxology. The growth of this church has been phenomenal and yet is the simple outcome of wise, persistent work on the part of the pastor and his helpers in a field large enough for the church which has grown up within it and which is still white unto the harvest.

The Warren Avenue Church, not far distant, under the pastorate of Rev. J. W. Fifield, D. D., has had an equally rapid growth and now reports a membership of more than six hundred. At Ravenswood, deeply afflicted in the death of its pastor, Rev. C. H. Keays, the church was encouraged by receiving into its fellowship as the first fruits of the harvest which had ripened under the care of its late leader thirty-seven persons, nearly all from the Sunday school. They had been in a class formed by the pastor and carefully instructed in the principles of Christianity and in the meaning of church membership. Two of the number were the sons of Mr. Keays. The service was conducted by Dr. Beaton of the Lincoln Park Church, one of Mr. Keays's special friends.

The brethren at Jefferson, a suburb connected by street cars with the city, dedicated a church building which is a gem of beauty, as convenient for work as it well can be, and, better still, wholly paid for. For many years this church has worshiped in a small, unattractive edifice and has had a slow growth. Two of its members who have become wealthy have largely, if not entirely, met the cost of the new house. Rev. A. M. Thome, considerably beyond seventy but still as vigorous as a boy, is the pastor. The dedication sermon was preached in the morning by Secretary Tompkins, in the afternoon congratulatory addresses were made by Drs. Silcox and Loba and Rev. Mr. Young. In the evening Dr. Gunsaulus spoke. April 11 the Washington Park Church will dedicate its house of worship. The Covenant Church is preparing to build, and plans are being considered for some other edifices which when realized will add much to the efficiency of several of our younger yet hopeful church enterprises.

Death of Orrington Lunt

In the death of Mr. Lunt, at the ripe age of eighty-two, our Methodist brethren, and especially the Northwestern University at Evanston, have lost a benefactor whose place will not soon be filled. He has long been a familiar figure in the business circles of Chicago, and for more than fifty years has been profoundly interested in its welfare. But his chief interest was in the kingdom of God. For his church and for its institutions of learning he gave freely, both of his money and his time. Although he has put into the university not less than $200,000, the library building being his last gift, the friends of the university say that his service has been even more valuable than his money. He selected the site on which stand the university buildings. To his energy and foresight, more than to those of any other man, is the prosperity of Evanston due.

Death of S. C. Griggs

For more than a year the friends of Mr. Griggs, for a generation our most prominent bookseller and publisher, the founder of the great house of A. C. McClurg & Co., have been fearing a speedy departure. At the time of his death he was the oldest member of the First Baptist Church. A year ago he disposed of his business to wait in patience his summons hence. He was stricken with apoplexy in February last year, and on Monday afternoon suffered from a second stroke, from which he never rallied. He was educated in Madison University, and in 1848 removed to Chicago and established the house of S. C. Griggs & Co. He began to import books in 1855, and to deal largely in theological works. In the fire of 1868 he lost more than $100,000, and in the great fire of 1871 it is estimated that his losses were considerably more than $300,000. His private residence and a valuable collection of paintings as well as of books was destroyed. Since then Mr. Griggs has confined his attention to the sale of books with his own imprint. He published the first book brought out in Illinois, Ford's History of the State. He enjoyed to the full the confidence and esteem of his fellow-citizens. He was never connected with any club or society outside the church.

The Moody Meetings

Now that they are over their success seems greater than during their continuance. Had the seating capacity of the Auditorium been six times 6,000 many believe it would have been full at every service. Mr. Moody never spoke more tenderly or more impressively. Sunday evening at the extra meeting held for men the room was crowded long before the hour set. At first the audience seemed cold and indifferent, but in response to Mr. Moody's words it soon became responsive and sympathetic. Next Sunday afternoon he will speak in the same place to women alone and in the evening to men. This week he has been at St. Louis. Multitudes of people who do not think of going to hear Mr. Moody read the reports of his sermons with the greatest avidity.

Ministers' Meeting

The hour was given up to a paper by Dr. J. E. Roy on What I Know About Congregationalism. It was one of those rare papers which Dr. Roy knows how to prepare, and was full of memories which only one who has had his protracted experience can give. He was followed by a brief address from Dr. Savage, now in his eightieth year and in his jubilee year in the West. The address was full of personal recollections of the condition of our churches when its author reached Chicago half a century ago. So impressed with the words of Dr. Roy and Dr. Savage were the brethren, that each was unanimously requested to prepare an autobiography and in it preserve the memories of the early self-sacrificing days through which the representatives of our New England churches passed.

The Woman's Board

The annual meeting was held this week with the hospitable church at Champaign, with many delegates present. The gathering was one of enthusiasm and profit. Mrs. C. H. Case of Chicago, the president, was in the chair. The annual reports were interesting and encouraging. Wednesday evening a large audience listened to an address on missions by Prof. W. D. Mackenzie, and to a statement of her experiences in Constantinople by Miss Anna Jones, a missionary in that city.

An Attack on Religion

As a sample of somewhat unusual bitterness of feeling on the part of "the unemployed" are these resolutions, passed with little opposition by Bohemians and Germans Sunday afternoon, April 4:

> Whereas, The present condition of the unemployed is unparalleled in the history of our country, and, as a result, starvation, crime and suicide go hand in hand with ever increasing wealth, and
>
> Whereas, This fearful condition is being glossed over by pretended theologians, followers of the rebellious and simple Nazarene; and
>
> Whereas, The church, which is supposed to be founded on the doctrine of the usury-hating Christ, is today the purchased oracle of wealth while pretending devotion and friendship to the outcasts and plundered; therefore be it
>
> Resolved, That we regard as our greatest foes the long-faced hypocrites who preach the blessings of poverty to the impoverished, and then with perfumed sophistry extol the magnificence, splendor and generosity of their lazy and wealthy masters.
> Resolved, That we look upon the so-called Christian Church of today as the greatest and most influential foe of humanity's onward progress.

Even Mr. Ingersoll could not wish for a more outspoken arraignment of the church than this. The statements are significant, for they indicate the bitterness, the growing bitterness, which is being cherished against the persons who are most friendly to labor and most anxious to alleviate the distress of the poor. The only man who spoke against the resolutions was silenced and several inflammatory addresses were made in which the Moody meetings and civil service were hit hard. The church was denounced as "the organized force that is causing the mental death and degradation of the masses." How are men with such prejudices against Christianity to be brought under its influence?

In and Around Boston

The Arts and Crafts Exhibit

Boston, which has taken the lead in so many intelligent movements for the good of the country, scored a new honor during the past fortnight in the first general exhibition of American arts and crafts in the United States, held from April 5–16 in Copley Hall. It is the first exhibition in our country, also, to give attention to the individual artisan, and it has proved a remarkable stimulus. The object has been to give a fair showing to all those who are doing good work, women and men alike, whether artist, workman or the firm which puts the product on the market.

It was a delightful thing to see, this display of a few specimens of the best work of our countrymen and women in designing and workmanship for all the so-called industrial arts—from stoves to bookcovers, from ecclesiastical furniture, embroideries and printing to wonderfully jeweled bracelets and twin rings, designed after a unique specimen for the third and the little finger, found in the ruins of ancient Cyprus. Women's work, which is well represented, was perhaps especially fine in the bookbindings and bookplates, stained glass windows and fire screens, embroideries, and designs for wall papers, silks, brocades and diverse other fabrics.

The most brilliant showing was made by several cases of gold, silver and metal work, and by the large tapestries. Pottery, decorated china, carved ivory and gilt Florentine picture frames, wall papers, tooled leather, carpets, furniture and work in many other useful arts were shown to the best advantage. The appreciation of this opportunity by the designers and manufacturers seems to have been equaled, if not excelled, by the appreciation of the visitors, many of whom have sought out the managers to enroll themselves among would-be purchasers of the best American products if they were put upon the market.

Beautiful and interesting as this show was of itself, the purpose behind it is of vastly greater importance. Mr. Henry Lewis Johnson, the originator and director of the undertaking, has drawn to it a small army of the most substantial people of Boston, New York and other parts of the United States.

Mr. Johnson said to The Congregationalist's reporter that this first exhibition of American arts and crafts was inspired by what has been done in England by the exhibitions held there for the past five years, and by the fact that the United States is far behind Europe in the quality and the quantity of our products, not because we lack skillful designers or craftsmen or enlightened manufacturers, but because the mass of our buyers do not appreciate our best work enough to pay the manufacturers to put it on the market, and, therefore, the few who want the best are obliged to send to Europe for it. It is believed that the movement to right this state of things must be made in many directions, and not least among the young people, to turn attention to the applied arts. Considering what is being done in Europe, it is believed that unless we devote a great deal of attention to technical schools and more artistic design and workmanship in our manufactures, that no tariff legislation will enable us to hold our own in the markets of the United States, to say nothing of those in Europe. Mr. Johnson gave some interesting figures, which show how England, Germany and France now supply the bulk of fine furnishings to all the world, and others which show how we may compete with them. England spends nearly $1,000,000 a year on industrial education. Germany is opening new technical and industrial schools nearly every month, and some of them number 2,000 students each. Our own showing is pitiful beside such figures.

A Novel and Profitable Gathering

A Quiet Day for Social Workers, conducted by Dean Hodges of the Episcopal Theological School of Cambridge, was held at St. Stephen's Church in Boston last Friday, April 9, under the auspices of the Church Social Union. Its object was threefold. First, to develop the sense of dependence upon communion with God as the one source of all effective work for others; second, to tighten the bonds of fellowship among all who are laboring among the poor; and third, to stimulate social workers to a thinking out of social problems, and to prayer to God who alone supplies wisdom and strength for their solution. There were prayers, reading and exposition of a brief passage of Scripture, an address and a season of meditation and silent devotions both morning and afternoon. A lunch was served to those remaining over the noon period, and after it a conference was held.

Dr. Hodges began his morning address by referring to the words painted on the walls of St. Bernard's cell, "Why are you here, Bernardo?" and said: "The meaning of this day is that we want success. We are here to wait before God that he may so speak to us as to make us successful in our social work. Applause," the speaker continued, "is not success, we should not estimate the value of what we have done by what people say about it. Neither is material achievement or elaberate organization success. We are apt to measure our success by the number of people whom we reach. How little our Lord cared for numbers! His great purpose seemed to be to influence the little group and send them out to influence others. Again, we are not succeeding when we are busy. One may be so occupied in the doing of religious things that he has no time to enrich his own life.

"The only success worth anything is that which results in the transformation of character. And to achieve this we must begin with the betterment of our own character. For this we need idealistic tendencies that we may see our work in its larger bearings and relations, an aggressive optimism to save us when things appear to be going wrong, a right emphasis so we may decide among many things to be done what to do, but above all enrichment of life."

In the conference the temptations of the social worker were discussed. Among those spoken of were the antithetical ones of too great definiteness and too great indefiniteness, of being too minute on the one hand and too vague on the other hand; also the temptation of overstatement, arising from seeing a thing close at hand and keenly feeling it; and the temptation of worry and haste.

In the afternoon address, after enumerating some of the means which God has given us for the enrichment of life, Mr. Hodges proceeded to speak of the "spirit of wise conservatism" in which the social worker should take the community, after the example of Christ, finding out all that is good and true in it and building on that.

A half-hour of meditation and silent prayer followed the address before the closing prayers. The whole day was spiritually restful, refreshing and uplifting.

Berkeley's Threescore and Ten

The seventieth anniversary, which began at Berkeley Temple Sunday, continued through last week, the Sunday school service of Monday evening being particularly interesting. The superintendent, Mr. Conant, welcomed the audience, and an ex superintendent, Mr. B. W. Williams, gave a historical address of interest. The other speakers were Mr. W. N. Hartshorn, Dr. G. M. Boynton, Mr. J. W. Brown and Mr. G. W. Coleman, all representing special Sunday school interests.

Tuesday, "workers' night," offered a pleasing illustration of The Berkeley Temple Tree and Its Fruit. Following the words of the pastor, Rev. C. A. Dickinson, D. D., all the departments of the church were represented—the school of applied Christianity, Endeavor Societies, Women's Society, diaconate, office department, institute, Sunday school, King's Daughters, Boys' Brigade, Temperance Guild and League. Wednesday evening a social reunion was enjoyed, and Thursday the Temperance Guild conducted appropriate exercises, during which the organization and work and some of the reformed men of the guild were heard from. Speeches were made by a number of others, and the closing address was by Pres. E. G. Arey of the league. On Friday the church prayer meeting and roll-call secured a large attendance, the pastor presiding. The occasion was an enjoyable, homelike reunion, as the close of a successful celebration period.

The New Psychology and Religion

If any one entered Pilgrim Hall last Monday morning with the expectation of hearing a purely technical and abstruse dissertation on matters touching the supersensuous realm of human life, he certainly came out with the conviction that such themes can be handled in a way to compel the attention and stimulate the interest of the average mind, provided it be awake at all to intellectual problems. The topic, The New Psychology and Religion, was certainly one well suited to a ministerial gathering, and Rev. C. F. Carter, who discussed it in a paper of considerable length, is exceptionally well qualified, through special study and research, to treat it. While his paper hewed so close to the heart of the matter as to win the outspoken praises of men like Dr. G. A. Gordon, it was at the same time presented in a popular way and lit up here and there with illustrations that were as bright as they were pat.

The first part of the address described the new psychology, characterizing it as concerned as of yore with the phenomena of mind, but approaching the facts from the material side. The modern psychologist despises the man who sits down in his armchair and hopes by self-introspection to reach substantial conclusions. On the contrary, the new professor works in a laboratory equipped with curiously devised apparatus for detecting and measuring the mind in the very act of mentality.

The practical value of the new science in enforcing ethical teaching and in clarifying mental and spiritual growth was then set forth. The newer conception proclaims the moral law with a new and strong tone of authority, and one which appeals especially to young men trained in the scientific methods of modern thought. The fact that the moral life and the Christ life are in the highest sense not extra natural, but thoroughly normal, was emphasized. A man can truly exist for himself only as he lives for the universe. The image of Christ must be transcribed on the heart, not for its own sake alone, but in order that the issue of the life may be worthy.

Dr. Hale's Return

One of the most popular and beloved men in Boston is Rev. Dr. E. E. Hale. He was absent on a vacation of a few weeks when his seventy-fifth birthday occurred, April 3, but it was marked by warm congratulations both in the daily press and from a multitude of friends. Last Sunday he was welcomed home by a large congregation, and the pulpit was laden with flowers, whose perfume made the entire audience-room fragrant. A movement to raise a Hale Endowment Fund of $25,000, to be presented to the Ten Times One Society as a memorial of his seventy-fifth birthday, has made encouraging progress.

OPINIONS ON CONGREGATIONAL WORK

The advent of Congregational Work, instead of consolidating the missionary intelligence of our societies into one publication, seems merely to have added another paper to those we are expected to read. From a layman's point of view it looks unreasonable, as well as being financial folly, to go to multiplying publications covering substantially the same ground and appealing to the same readers. While the missionary magazines may furnish more matter concerning their individual work, I question very much whether more of it is read than the amount of each furnished by Congregational Work. The idea of a composite paper is a good one, and the selfishness of the individual societies ought not to hinder its success.

The matter, however, is of easy adjustment. Let those who believe in Congregational Work discontinue the separate magazines. Congregational Work read through is much better than six magazines scarcely more than glanced at. C. F. R.

I was grieved at the criticism of "B" in The Congregationalist of March 18, respecting Congregational Work. It seems to me unkind and unjust to call it, at this early day, a "first-class failure." A paper must be a growth. Such a new departure in journalism must "feel after" its proper bearings till it find them. To me it seems very far from being a failure. I have read each number through with increasing interest. I have felt that for first numbers in anything so new in scope and idea it was very well done. I also have caused one hundred copies to be circulated in my parish, and I believe it is a move in the right direction.

Why the brother should have expected the other missionary journals at once to disappear I am at a loss to understand. Such never was the intention. It was said at the outset, and has been constantly reiterated, that it was not to supplant, but to supplement, the others. I should be grieved to have the magazines disappear unless they could be combined, which would be, I admit, the ideal way. But even in that case this cheaper production would be desirable for general distribution. "Something is radically wrong" in our societies. One man thinks it is high time to stop flinging these unsupported and injurious statements into the midst of the churches. The injury that is being done by such random assertions is incalculable. If the brother finds it "harder and harder to persuade people to give generously" to our societies, it is largely because of the distrust aroused by these random assertions.

It is probably true that there are things in all our societies that need adjusting, but I assert with the utmost confidence that there is nothing "radically wrong" in our societies that should arouse a shade of distrust or divert one penny from their treasuries. They are doing a work worthy of the most unquestioning confidence, even though they are just now being subjected to a searching scrutiny, and though there are some things that need to be corrected.

A DEFENSE OF LENT

In reading your excellent paper I came across this In Brief: "Lent in the Episcopal Church calendar begins March 3. But so far as any special gifts of the Holy Spirit are concerned, they are ready whenever we are ready to receive them. The Bible speaks of 'a set time' to favor Zion. But it nowhere indicates that the church is to set the time. 'Now is the acceptable time.'"

Why then, may I ask, have many of your churches begun to follow the Episcopal Church's example in observing Christmas? And what authority have you for the appointment of the Week of Prayer? Lent is the commemoration of the Passion of Jesus Christ and the Episcopal Church bids those who love him, who suffered and died for them, dwell especially on this phase in the Saviour's life, and to take to heart the great and solemn lesson.

It is thus with all the seasons of the Episcopal Church. One after another the events in the life of our Lord are brought before her people. The system all revolves around him who was born, suffered, died, rose again for us. To one appeals the birth, the little helpless child; to another the Passion, to another the turning point, the new start, comes with Good Friday, this day of awful, heart-rending lessons. This day alone will break down the reserve of some stubborn soul. And so on through the year, with loving insistence, the church presents the great events in the life of Christ. AN EPISCOPALIAN.

THE WORLD'S TWELVE GREAT PAINTINGS

The Congregationalist recently alluded to the twelve greatest paintings of the world and said that ten are directly connected with Christ. It is easy to count up six or eight paintings and say, "Those are certainly world pictures," but beyond that number I am not sure. I have discussed the question with several persons, but no two agree in making the list of twelve "world pictures." So I appeal to The Congregationalist. Perhaps there are others who would be glad to see its list.

Berlin, Germany. L. P. P.

Authorities of course differ, but the following list has the approval of experts. We published several years ago a series of articles describing each of the twelve mentioned below:

Raphael's Transfiguration.
Raphael's Sistine Madonna.
Angelo's Last Judgment.
Domenichino's Last Communion of St. Jerome.
Volterra's Descent from the Cross.
Da Vinci's Last Supper.
Titian's Assumption of the Virgin.
Correggio's Holy Night.
Guido Reni's Aurora.
Guido Reni's Beatrice Cenci.
Murillo's Immaculate Conception of the Virgin.
Rubens's Descent from the Cross.

EXAMINE THE CANDIDATE PRIVATELY

The object of the examination of a candidate for installation is not to provide an exercise for the edification of spectators. It is purely for the information of the council as to his qualifications. Consequently it ought to be searching and thorough, and the conditions ought to be favorable to entire frankness of utterance.

It is almost inevitable that the presence of people from the church to which the candidate has been called, and with whom he is perhaps just beginning his acquaintance, will place a certain constraint upon the freedom of the council in the examination. Sympathy for him and a desire not to place him in a position of embarrassment or apparent weakness before his parishioners are considerations certain to enter in. It is a common thing to hear members of a council say afterwards: "I should have questioned him about this or that, but forbore because of the presence of some of his people. I wish him well, and I preferred not to press any inquiry that might place him in an unfortunate light before them."

There is, moreover, a good reason why a candidate should not be expected to give a full account of himself theologically in the presence of members of his parish at the outset of his work among them. If he is to be their teacher there will be a progress in his teaching. He will not thrust all his views upon them at once, but will gradually unfold them as he finds the people ready for them. It is a credit to him rather than otherwise, if, at the beginning of his pastorate, he feels that he "has many things to say unto them," but that they "cannot bear them now." Is it fair to him and to the future of his work that he should be required to state in their presence at the beginning all that he intends to teach them?

On the other hand, it is in the highest degree proper that all these things should be frankly and fully made known to the council. The church has summoned it for this purpose, in order that it may examine their candidate and advise them as to whether he is a safe teacher for them. The council, therefore, should have the fullest privilege of inquiry, but it should take place behind closed doors, and only its results be reported to the church.

I submit the question whether this change in our customs, which any council would be entirely free to introduce, would not tend to greater thoroughness and freedom in the examination, and at the same time avoid those unpleasant after effects which close questioning in a public examination is apt to produce in a parish. We examine candidates for church membership privately before the committee. Why not follow the same plan in the examination of candidates for the pastorate? A PASTOR.

A LEVEL-HEADED OPTIMIST

I am deeply impressed with the prevalence of the notion that we have drifted socially toward the bow-wows during the last two or three generations. Here and there I hear a minister lifting up his little wail to that effect. During the last campaign we heard a lot about it and it had its influence upon some people. On the other hand there is a shallow optimism that yawps its yawp, as Walt Whitman ought to have said if he didn't, about the destiny of the Anglo-Saxon race and the beatific vision it must realize whether it behaves itself or not. I am honestly interested in the Anglo-Saxon race; I even think so well of it that I would like to lend a hand in keeping it from going to the devil, to whom I don't think it at all belongs. And I have a notion that one of the best medicines for its varied ills is a clearer vision of the kingdom of God, and a better realization of what even very faulty ideas of the kingdom have done for it in the last hundred years. MEMORIES OF MARY LYON

We lived in a town near that of Mary Lyon's early home. The first months of my seminary course were the last ones of Mary Lyon's life and work in her beloved seminary. Her cheerful impulse was felt in every department. Not alone in her own teaching and in chapel exercises, but even in the domestic work her occasional coming to the various groups, busy at the work in which all bore their part, and her pleasant words spoken there gave real stimulus and cheer. No pen can describe the wonderful sweetness and beauty of her chapel talks during the last week she was with us. The heavenly gates were opened wide; she seemed to enter there and bring us into the living presence of Jesus himself. Her face aglow with heavenly light, with the earnestness of Paul and the love of John, she portrayed the life above. For the sake of us, "her dear children," she would tarry longer here. Little did we think that in so short a time she would enter in, and we be left each one to take up some bit of her life work.

"SING YE LOWLY, SING YE GREAT"

BY HARRIET MC EWEN KIMBALL

Sing ye lowly, sing ye great,
With the Easter joy elate;
Christ the Lord is risen indeed!
Crown of hope for every need!

Poverty and wealth akin
In the piteous bond of sin,
Eager youth and anxious age,
Bound on common pilgrimage;

One and all uplift the strain,
Christ our Saviour lives again!
Lives to set us free once more,
As we journey goes before.

All the way he maketh bright;
It was dark, but he is light;
It was weary, he is rest;
He our end as he our quest.

Wandering sinner, striving saint,
Prisoner hopeless of complaint,
Courage kindles now anew,
Christ the Lord is risen for you!

Lift your head, poor penitent!
Mercy is with judgment blent;
Christ is risen to bestow
Just the peace you long to know.

Mourner, weeping at the tomb,
See how e'en the grave may bloom!
Where he lay what hopes were sown!
Make the harvest sweet your own.

For us men a Man was he;
Never friend so close could be!
For us helpless he o'ercame;
We may conquer in his Name.

For us mortal he divine
Makes the way immortal shine;
With the Comforter bestows
Grace no life unquickened knows.

Death his flesh could not constrain;
Lord of Life he lives again;
God of God, and Light of Light,
Sing his triumph, sing his might!

In a delightful article on novel reading in The Journal of Hygiene the writer advocates a fresh perusal of the great works of fiction every few years. He claims that we do most of our novel reading in early youth, when our attention is absorbed in the love motive, and we fail to see the book as a complete work of art. But no great work of art, in sculpture, music, painting or literature, can exert its true influence upon us unless we have studied it in different moods or at different epochs in our lives. It is desirable, therefore, to own books of this character rather than to depend upon public libraries for them. If we have them lying about within easy reach, where we can pick them up at odd moments, or select them in accordance with our mental mood, we are far more likely to secure repeated readings of classic authors. A due sense of the real values of life will lead to moderate outlay for the pleasures of the table, which lose their significance the instant they are over, and to a more generous expenditure for lasting food for the mind.

If your thoughts of Christ practically end with his crucifixion and burial, your faith in him will have no vigor, your joy no fervor or passion, and you will know very little of the blessedness of the Christian redemption.—R. W. Dale.

EASTERTIDE

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The while my pulses faintly beat,
My faith doth so abound,
I feel grow firm beneath my feet
The green, immortal ground.

So, anticipating the hour of her departure, sang dear Alice Cary, her strain akin to that triumphal hymn of her sister Phœbe, familiar to us all:

One sweetly solemn thought
Comes to me o'er and o'er,
I'm nearer my home in heaven today
Than ever I've been before.

Nearer the bound of life,
Laying my burdens down,
Nearer leaving the cross,
Nearer wearing the crown.

Christina Rossetti, in a poem on Good Friday, exclaims;

Am I a stone, and not a sheep,
That I can stand, O Christ, beneath thy cross,
To number drop by drop thy blood's slow loss,
And yet not weep?

Not so those women loved,
Who with exceeding grief lamented thee,
Not so fallen Peter, weeping bitterly,
Not so the thief was moved.

In Bishop Westcott's remarkable book, The Revelation of the Risen Lord, he dwells on the return of the Master after the three days in the grave, the same yet different, and shows by a convincing argument from the Scriptures how the "thought of that life, of that Providence, of that presence, of that communion, of that mystery of pain, has passed into the world and become part of the heritage of mankind." Good Friday and Easter belong to us and are our treasures beyond price. The old hymn sung by God's people for centuries cries out exultingly:

He who bore all pain and loss
Comfortless upon the cross,
Lives in glory now on high,
Pleads for us and hears our cry.

The very core of the Easter consolation is in that simple line, "Pleads for us and hears our cry." For our Christ is the Lord of the living, alone able to say, "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore." The Easter music, the Easter flowers, the Easter joy are comprehended in that statement that our Brother, our Redeemer, our Master, daily sees our needs and daily presents our prayers and pleads for us, too, and never a moment of any day forgets one of us whom he loves.

Easter is to Christmas as the flower to the bud. Between the two great holy days there stretches the whole of the Christ-life on the earth, the healing of the sick, the giving of sight to the blind, the going about on the hills and through the vales of Galilee, the words he spoke, the deeds he did, from the hour that his ministry began until he cried, "It is finished," upon Calvary. The most amazing period in the story of time, those three years in which God tabernacled in human flesh, is commemorated in two small places, Bethlehem and Easter—the one with the star-beam, the other with the day-dawn, the one with those who worshiped at the cradle, the other with those who sought the garden tomb, and both with the help and the song of the angelic visitors who came to serve their Lord.

Easter, even more than Christmas, speaks very tenderly to those who follow Christ in lowly dependence and unfaltering trust. Its gladness strikes a deeper note. Its light seems brought from the very inmost radiance of heaven. We are dull of vision, but at Easter we catch a glimpse of that world of fullest brightness which is just beyond this sphere of strife and this school in which we are taught the lore of the kingdom.

In Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress there is a passage which I think especially suitable to the Eastertide. Christian and his fellow-pilgrim, Hopeful, have arrived at the gate over which is written, in letters of gold, "Blessed are they that do His commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." And as, at the word of the King, they entered in and were transfigured, there were those that met them with harps to praise withal, and with crowns in token of honor. Then, says Bunyan, "I heard in my dream that all the bells in the city rang again for joy, and that it was said unto them, 'Enter ye into the joy of your Lord.'" One more radiant glimpse is vouchsafed to the dreamer, and he adds, "After that they shut up the gates, which when I had seen I wished myself among them."

The comfort of Easter is largely in the closer union it gives us with heaven. A great company of our friends and kindred are there. For some of us the number on the other side is much in excess of the number here. And Christ is there, the Christ of Nazareth, of Galilee, and of this waning century and this country of ours as well. Often we are amazed at our insensibility to the suffering Christ. Often we are vexed at our lack of loyalty to the reigning Christ. Yet there are days when the stony hearts melt and we have throbbing hearts of flesh. There are days when our love goes joyously out to greet our King. And evermore, not at Eastertide only but in all tides of time,

He who bore our pain and loss lives for our redemption.

Our word resurrection seems to concentrate the history of the universe to whisper the secret of the life of God.—W. C. Gannett.

HER RESURRECTION DAY

BY CHARLOTTE MELLEN PACKARD

The bishop was weary that Easter eve, yet his visitor, who might have seen it, lingered unaccountably. She was a woman past middle age, of composed manner and penetrative glance, clad in fine, simple mourning, which suited her pale, clear face and slender hight.

Bishop Lisle knew her through the charitable work in which for three years past she had shown rare capacity. Among discharged convicts—those perilous waiters on fortune—she had been taking life as the depraved or tempted see it, reaching out clean, helpful hands in sympathy at once sincere and stimulating.

Mrs. Dacre was not of the great man's distinct flock, but of the wider world which claimed him scarcely less. Now and then she laid before him some peculiar difficulty, resting her tired spirit on his strong counsel, and his impression of her was most favorable. The modest directness of manner and speech that marked her were in grateful contrast to much self-conscious and fussy effort of women in high life who loved to ring his door-bell.

Of the missionary's private history he knew little save that her late husband had been a fast, fashionable man, who left his wife no money beyond her own fortune. Soon after his death Mrs. Dacre had retired to quiet lodgings, reduced her expenses in every way and with brief preparation given herself to the work mentioned. Bishop Lisle sometimes met her in the dreary precincts where he, too, carried the benediction of his presence. Again, in the crowded Church of St. Andrew, he caught the woman's uplifted look, seeking highest inspiration when doubts chilled her energy, and still again, but rarely, in houses where the best that society offers is enjoyed. There was no asceticism behind the absorption of Jane Dacre in interests her dearest friends hardly shared. The tide of human appeal was more potent than the appeal of literature or art to her kindled senses. She loved art and literature, but they did not hold her problems in solution.

The precious Saturday evening slipped away, but the trivial errand did not explain the missionary's pause after she had asked Bishop Lisle to say a few words at her women's meeting next day. Mrs. Dacre gazed absently into the fire, lifted and replaced a book at her elbow, studied the cathedral clock, no recent addition to the library, and then said, slowly: "The confessional is wonderfully adapted to a world-wide craving. Was he not a master of hearts who offered an impersonal yet human listener to the secrets of hearts? There are crises when one is driven to speak—yet how—unless"— She caught her breath and flushed painfully. "A master, indeed! I have often thought of the tremendous secrets Rome holds behind the veil of the confessional. What a dazzle of light on history were its seals open! And, after all, one is more stirred by imagining the triumphs or defeat of single souls made known to that waiting ear."

"I suppose," added the bishop, fancying that he saw the clew to what would follow, "you may find the confessional a hindrance to your success. Absolution is quite likely to thwart our efforts to secure genuine repentance by evading the need."

If the visitor heard she made no reply. Instead she exclaimed, looking him full in the face, "Bishop Lisle, you who carry so many burdens for others, who live a veiled life of your own, do you never long to utter yourself to a creature fallible like yourself, yet of divine charity? Have you never sighed for what the confessional represents?"

"A common wish, why should I furnish the exception? And you are troubled? Mrs. Dacre, pardon me if I overlook that you are so apt to sink your own personality in your work."

"I want to ask," she rejoined, speaking brokenly, "if open confession of sin should not be made by any true penitent? Is not this expiation required of those who break the laws of God and man? Must not somebody be aware of the fact if one is not—what one seems?"

"Public confession and restitution are sometimes possible, even obligatory, but in my view to repent of and forsake the sin and do the works meet for repentance is better than speech. It is unfortunate," he continued, giving the waiting soul time to recover its balance, "that private affairs are so often forced on the 'cure of souls'—as if it were his province especially to arbitrate in family quarrels, in social grievances, in the dire straits which none but God should view. Yet if I can aid, surely I am set in my place for the purpose."

"Tomorrow is Easter," Mrs. Dacre was quite calm and held herself erect now, "but this is my resurrection day, and I could not refrain my lips from confession that should have been made years ago. It was a selfish wrong done by me, in connection with the wealth I am thought so liberal in dispensing. A little fleeting power which came to me as a young girl deprived others of a fortune rightfully theirs. A man, almost a stranger, left me all he possessed and I took it, turning my back on the needy claimant to whom the bulk belonged. Mine it was in the sight of the law, and my vanity was tickled by the nine days' wonder created, but he was to have married another, in whose behalf a will had been made, only to be destroyed because of the freak his fancy played.

"You must know, bishop," she went on swiftly, anticipating his questions, "I might have prevented the act when he sent me word that he was dying and that I was to inherit his money. That I did not do. Repentance woke slowly. For a time I indulged my tastes freely, and I think wisely, by travel and study, and the association with persons better than myself, yet the man I married was of different fiber and he spent what I gave him—to his own and my endless regret—in such dissipation as society permits until it becomes offensive. He would have worked well in his chosen calling, but my money tempted him to idleness. Do you see? Can you guess the chain of consequences my sin had spun for me?"

Hot tears were dropping now that relieved as they fell.

"Perfectly," was the reply, in a tone that conveyed sympathy and encouragement. "And now how can I aid you? As I read your story your missionary work among criminals seemed to you a natural atonement for what you have come to regard as dishonesty in your past life. The more you see and feel the burden of sin, not merely as a physical condition but as abhorrent to God himself, the more keenly memory stings"—

"Beyond words to express!" she interrupted. "I have sought your advice in what presents itself to me as an urgent duty. Should I not deepen my hold on the poor creatures who look up to me by saying, 'The temptation of some of you has been mine. I was accessory before the act to robbery such as shuts you behind prison bars!' They regard me as one stepping down from a sphere of immaculate purity to their relief, while much thought proves to me that our spheres are not so far sundered. Why, I have been an arrant hypocrite instead of the being they picture me."

In her excitement she had risen, and, like a prisoner at the bar, turned pitiful eyes upon the impartial judge. The delicacy and purity of her face struck him as never before. He was aware that the degraded creatures whom she had reached looked on Mrs. Dacre, "the white missioner," as she was named, as "goodness itself and no airs neither." An incorrigible thief reported this to the bishop.

"It is a sick world, my masters," sighed the reluctant witness to this transformation scene, one of so many that room had guarded. "But my dear Mrs. Dacre," he said, gently, "you are mistaken in thus ranking yourself with criminals. Selfish and wrong you may have been, but the distribution of property furnishes countless instances to match yours. One is not a thief for accepting what might in the course of nature have gone to another person. I would not by one iota diminish your sincere regret for sin, but does not your innate integrity show itself in these wrestlings of conscience? As for hypocrisy, are you not sincere in your efforts to follow the Lord Christ in your ministry to the outcast? Have you a selfish end to gain in the applause of your fellows? No, no!" added the wise man, as she shook her head and betrayed in her sudden quiet the saner mood stealing on. "Your secret experience is truly a link between you and the obvious offenders against society, but do not fancy that to brood over one's errors morbidly, as you are doing, purifies and exalts. This mistake is world-old, but it cripples human usefulness. The past is with God," he added, solemnly. "He blots out our transgressions and remembers them no more when we cast them off.

"I am of the opinion," the bishop had paced the floor a few times in reflection and spoke in his ordinary tone, "that your influence would be less instead of greater were you to place your past experience before the persons whom you had brought your mind to conceive of as fellow-sinners, in fact, if not in degree. In general one admits that. They are not analysts to make nice distinctions between phrases, and they would never distinguish the overwrought conscience voiced as tonight and the common confession of sturdy lawbreakers. All that the sense of fellowship imparts they get from one another. Joy in heaven over the one sinner that repenteth is often taken as a reflection on the just persons who need no repentance. Yet the world's Redeemer was a man separate from sinners. Rescue work depends on men and women of clear record and the unclean demand this with reason."

Mrs. Dacre drew a long breath of relief. "How can I thank you for the good sense you opposed to my lack of it, for the medicine of kindness and appreciation? Only those who spend much time with the morally diseased and weakened realize how difficult it is to preserve the normal key. One hardens now and then, wearied out, or one gets hysterical with pity and useless perplexities. My usual self-control bides the woman's extremes of feeling." She smiled, drawing her furs about her preparatory to leaving.

With slight hesitation her host said, after responding to these expressions, "You doubtless have made what reparation was possible to the individual whom you mentioned as needy?"

"Secretly, yes. My name will not suggest itself to her as that of her unknown benefactor. I prefer to remain such, because from what I ascertain she cannot forgive me, and would disdain my services."

"Then your right course is to go forward in the grace of our Lord and in the life more abundant which he came to bring. Take your Easter as promise and sign that the Helper is always coming to hearts that wait for him. Look up for your message, not down into the recesses of your own experience, save as it testifies of him. This is my Easter discourse to you, my friend," and the bishop, with cordial smile and hand clasp, let the missionary pass out into the night.

EASTER LINES

BY REV. J. D. KINGSBURY, D. D.

Hail to the Saviour! now risen in glory,
Join with the angels exultant in song;
Tell in loud anthems the wonderful story,
Jesus is risen, his praises prolong.

Once he was burdened with earth's tribulations,
Bore in his anguish our sins and our tears;
Now he receives amid heaven's gratulations
Blessing and glory through endless years.

Dark was the tomb while night dews were weeping
Over the watch and the seal and the stone;
Silent the garden where Jesus lay sleeping,
Waiting the day-star, the bright Easter dawn.

Bursts on the night air the radiant morning,
Christ hath arisen! the glorified Son,
Mists of the night are heaven's adorning,
Earth, shout the victory! heaven hath won.

Joy all ye people! awake to the gladness!
Heaven is nearing, its beauties we see;
Rifted the clouds of our sorrow and sadness,
Gleams in the distance the fair crystal sea.

Hail to Him glorified! clothed with power,
Sing all ye lands and the isles of the sea,
Loud hallelujahs lift up evermore,
Jesus is risen, 'tis earth's jubilee.

IMPROVED HEALTH AMONG WOMEN

The secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Health, Dr. S. W. Abbott, has suggested that the use of the bicycle may account for the decreased death rate from pulmonary consumption among the women of this commonwealth. The number of women, however, who use the wheel, is still relatively small, and its introduction is so recent that striking results can scarcely appear as yet in the statistical tables. We must seek further for adequate causes for the gratifying change which Dr. Abbott reports. They are many and familiar, but deserve a fresh rehearsal.

In the first place it is fashionable for women as well as men to be in good health. The number of women who "enjoy poor health" is small and rapidly growing less. Cases of hysteria and fainting are already rare. Pallor is not generally regarded as an element of beauty. Forced and abnormal minimums of measurement have lost much of their charm. Good health is attractive, contagious and always at a premium. It is a regret and mortification to most sane women to be ill. Fashion rules in matters within human control, and health is largely so.

Preventive medicine has been accepted and adopted. The dread of the physician's visit has mostly disappeared. To avert an illness is considered as much a duty as to employ remedies for recovery. Fatalism is no longer a motive to delay and inaction. The beginnings of disorders, as well as serious maladies, receive prompt attention. In short, women have made a serious business of keeping well, and the physician in a truly professional spirit has made it his specialty to break up fevers, to ward off threatening diseases and fortify the body against the inroads of sickness. Diagnosis and treatment as well as surgery and nursing have made amazing progress in the last few years, and women have profited by this advance more than men. Is it an unfounded tradition that quackery used to thrive among women more than with the hardier sex?

Women dress with greater regard to health and to that comfort which makes for health. While they pay far more attention to style and fashion than did their ancestors, they follow a better rule for clothing, and they follow it more intelligently. They protect themselves from rain and cold by the aids of the new materials and appliances. Business advertisements show that "hygienic clothing" appeals to feminine interest. Fabrics and garments all are brought to this practical test—are they rational as well as durable, beautiful and becoming? Fashion is still a tyrant, but reform is at work towards emancipation and liberty.

House sanitation has become a science, and women's health more than men's has been promoted thereby. Ventilation, drainage, temperature, sunlight, scrupulous cleanliness, within and without the dwelling, have become the watchwords of housekeepers. The toilet conveniences of modern plumbing invite and encourage that personal physical care which lies at the basis of physical health, happiness and beauty.

Women's work has become much easier by the introduction of modern inventions. The carpet sweeper, set tubs, the wringing machine, perhaps also the sewing machine, mean easier hours, pleasurable activity in place of depressing drudgery, and they relieve the breaking strain. Any housekeeper of an earlier day could give almost countless instances of improvements since she was a child in the methods and the means of housekeeping, most of them going to spare women's strength and protect women's health. It is easier to keep house and provide for a family than it used to be. Much which once fell upon the matron of the house now never comes into the house at all, or comes in a way which makes the burden comparatively light.

Modern civilization, notwithstanding its complexity and intensity, affords that intellectual and social amelioration of women's lives which promotes the cheerfulness, hopefulness and elasticity of temper which minister directly to good health and long life. Men take upon themselves in a true gallantry some of the burdens which used to press so heavily upon the women folks. Women have begun to enjoy outdoor life, and to avail themselves of the systematic outings which till quite recently were more exclusively the privilege and habit of men. The way was prepared for the bicycle by the growing appreciation of nature and of exhilarating exercise in the open air, and an increasing participation by women in outdoor sports and festivals. By a great variety of changed circumstances and changes of popular opinion, especially by a better understanding of the laws of health and disease and a higher estimate of the blessings of health, women have been relieved of much that was the direct occasion of sickness and early death and introduced into much that contributes to sound health and long life. ARGAND.

One who recently visited Mrs. Cleveland was impressed with the extreme simplicity of the children's dresses, which were without ribbon, sash or ornament of any kind. The visitor said, "I thought what an object lesson this was to tired, worn-out mothers who struggle so hard to ruffle and tuck and furbelow their children's dresses, instead of taking the time to cultivate their minds and hearts."

Closet and Altar

Your life needs days of retirement, when it shuts the gates upon the noisy whirl of action and is alone with God.

To feel a conviction of immortality we must live for it. Let any one firmly believe that the soul is permanent and live from that belief, and soon existence will seem permanent, too; the world becomes the veil of a brighter glory that lies behind it; the condemnation of unbelief is lifted off, since the mind, conscious of its own rooted being, does not wait for immortality, "but is passed from death unto life."—Thomas Starr King.

Christ rose not from the dead,
Christ still is in the grave,
If thou, for whom he died,
Art still of sin the slave.
—Sixteenth Century Hymn.

The resurrection of Christ is of no avail to thee unless Christ also rises in thy soul. Nor is it enough that Christ should arise in thy soul but once, for the old Adam cannot be destroyed in a single moment. The old sinful nature strives daily to live anew in thee, and daily must thou destroy it that Christ may daily begin to live in thee. Christ ascended not to heaven nor entered into his glory until after his resurrection from death, and so thou wilt not enter into the heavenly glory until Christ first rises and lives in thee.—Gerhard.

Arise, sad heart; if thou dost not withstand,
Christ's resurrection thine may be.
Do not by hanging down break from the Hand
Which as it riseth, raiseth thee.
Arise! Arise!
—Herbert.

We are the children of the resurrection, and the dearness of the earth in all its warm and joyous life under the sun is the greater when we remember that our Lord returned thereto from the tomb, and was again known unto his disciples in the breaking of bread. The sun, for whose coming we ever look, is his true symbol, for his appearings are from everlasting to everlasting. It is newness of life that we seek, and this we have always, having his life in us—the Vine which, after innumerable vintages, still blossometh in all its branches. It is he who is our springtime, with his baptism of flame quickening the tender buds and consuming all the dead wood.—Henry M. Alden.

Blessed be thou, O God! who hast raised up our Lord Jesus from the dead that he might be the first fruits of them that are asleep. We bless thee for his service of humiliation, his atoning death, his glorious resurrection and his continuing life. For his sake pardon our transgressions and shortcomings and enable us so to use this world of passion and temptation that we may win the victory of faith. Teach us to live as heirs of the inheritance Christ's death has purchased, and to die as those who follow without fear the path of him who conquered death. Out of the experience of thy love we praise thee. With the innumerable company of the redeemed in heaven and earth we worship the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, who died and rose again and lives in an immortal life. Glory be to thee, O Christ! in heaven and earth forevermore. Amen!

Mothers in Council

O, gracious Saviour, who dost knock at the door of our hearts, we would open unto thee and bid thee take possession of our lives. We are ignorant; enlighten us by thy heavenly wisdom. We are weak; strengthen us by thy holy might. We are burdened with responsibilities, some of which thou dost lay upon us; but we thank thee for the assurance that those who bear thy yoke shall know thy rest. We would gratefully accept all heaven-sent cares. Help us, we entreat thee, to divest ourselves of anxiety concerning unworthy things, to rid ourselves of undue care concerning the "meat that perisheth." O, thou who didst love to tarry in the Bethany home, abide in our homes and hallow them by thy presence. Enrich our family life with the consciousness that thou, our Elder Brother, art in our midst. Bless the aged ones whom we cherish with tender love while they linger in Beulah Land, bless the young men and maidens as they gird themselves for the work of life, the boys and girls who bring cheer and buoyancy into our homes, and the wee bairns whom thou dost give to lead us back to thyself. Help us to become like these little children that so we may enter into the kingdom of heaven. Amen.

"LOOK OUT AND NOT IN"

Is it well to awaken in a young child the sense of sin? The question was first raised in these columns several months ago, and the account of little Avie's experience must still be remembered by many. Upon one mother at least that record made a profound impression, leading to much serious questioning as to the wisdom of the course pursued by Avie's mother. At the close of the article expressions of opinion were asked for, and several such have appeared. So far, however, the burden of testimony has been on the affirmative side of the question. A different view is here suggested.

In these days the followers of Froebel and those interested in child study unite in warning mothers against any training of their children which may result in self-consciousness. The kindergartner teaching her class a new game guides the children entirely through imitation and the enthusiasm of united action, never by express directions as to the position of hands or feet. The theory is that when a child's attention is concentrated upon himself he loses grace and freedom and immediately becomes awkward. Even in giving piano lessons modern teachers begin to realize that the pupil's mind must be fixed upon the musical thought to be expressed, while the fingers are unconsciously trained in the positions necessary for technical skill.

In all branches of education it is more and more true that the thought of the student is led away from himself and fixed in eager pursuit upon the goal toward which he is working. In controlling the moral standards of their pupils teachers rely less upon methods of punishment, or even upon direct admonition, and more upon the wholesome influence of some absorbing occupation, the uplift of high ideals. The effort is to fill the life of the child with right activities and his mind with noble thoughts in order to crowd out evil tendencies.

In all these methods is there not a direct lesson for us along spiritual lines? To awaken in a young child the sense of sin seems a certain way to produce morbid self-consciousness. Introspection brings a doubtful benefit to adults. To deliberately foster it in a child is unnatural and unwise. Self-examination and the awful, overwhelming sense of sinfulness must come to each of us at some time in our lives, but if such an experience is forced upon a child it necessarily weakens and dwarfs the spiritual life, just as a child's physique may be forever stunted by carrying too early burdens which are suited only to the strength of maturity. I can never forget the fearful ordeal through which I passed when a child lest I should have been guilty of the unpardonable sin. I scrutinized every thought and feeling, and grew morbidly afraid of my own innocent thoughts and questionings. The possibility of having unconsciously committed that mysterious sin haunted me day and night. At length I went to my mother in despair, and found relief in her assurance that one who had indeed so fallen would be utterly hardened and feel no anxiety about his own state. My very fear and sensitiveness thus became a comfort to me, but a loss of power for action must follow so exhausting a struggle. As Drummond says, "The energies which are meant to be spent on the work of Christ are consumed in the soul's own fever." Jesus said, "Suffer little children to come unto me," but the first effect of a sense of sin is that of separation from God. In dealing with a child's sensitive conscience is there not danger that the sense of separation may become too deep and bitter, and that the child may fail to grasp the possibility of forgiveness? Surely the principle of growth is a safer one, and it is wonderfully easy to lead these little ones to love and follow Jesus, growing up unconsciously into "his likeness," and so living a life "all sunshine in the beauty of the Lord." DOROTHEA BIRD.

PAPA AT BREAKFAST

However dear and lovable mamma is, however good the breakfast, the meal is not complete to the children so long as the father's chair is vacant. Instinctively, and perhaps unconsciously, every little one (to say nothing of mamma) suffers some strain of expectancy till the father comes. He is their king, they love him, they worship him in their child feelings. All that they are interested in they would like to submit to him in one way or another, and they, being children, are more keenly alive then than at any other meal of the day. When at last the great man's step is heard, all this sentiment among his pretty brood rushes toward him. They may not speak; they may be too well trained to do so, or too shy. The feeling is there, and how heavy a price the father pays who chills it with his entrance, who comes, not only late, but absorbed in himself, makes everybody wait upon him in haste, dispatches his orders for the day between mouthfuls, and rushes off to his office with a hasty kiss all around. The wife may have schooled herself till she does not mind, and the children may not comprehend for years what giving and taking of happiness they might have realized in that morning hour. But whether they know it or not, their expectancy and affection are cooled a little more each day. The minds also have less to say, as they learn that they are not to be heard, but each one will have its awakening some day. And the father must be the loser in their respect, their admiration and their confidence, and he deserves to lose these precious things in inverse proportion to all he can possibly get out of that extra twenty minutes in bed. HELEN AINSLIE SMITH.

HEALTH NOTES

In Dr. Nansen's fascinating story of Arctic life he maintains that the whole secret of healthful living lies "in arranging things sensibly and especially in being careful about the food." He marvels how one ever can be ill if he has abundant exercise in the open air, no overexertion in the way of work, instructive and amusing books, and relaxation in the shape of music, games and story telling.

A French physician has been lecturing lately on the evil effects of a sensational press, which he considers the greatest single cause of nervous diseases. Startling headlines thrust before one, day after day, he says, have a tendency to keep the mind expectant and excited, a sure beginning of nervous deterioration. It is encouraging to hear the voice of science against "yellow" journalism, supplementing the protests of educators and moralists.

The pernicious habit of nibbling at fruit, nuts and candies between meals is a prolific source of indigestion. The excess to which the habit may be carried is illustrated in the case of a woman to whom the doctor recommended malted milk tablets to be taken when traveling or on occasions when there were long intervals between meals. To his dismay he found that she ate them whenever, as she expressed it, she felt "all gone," which was many times a day. Thus all good effects were neutralized by keeping the stomach constantly at work.

So high an authority as the London Lancet declares that no two persons should habitually sleep together. Nothing will so derange the nervous system of one who is eliminative in nervous force as to lie all night in bed with another who is absorbent of nervous force. The latter will sleep soundly all night and arise refreshed in the morning, while the former will toss restlessly and awake in the morning fretful, peevish and discouraged. Fortunately fashion now agrees with hygiene in decreeing that only single beds shall be used in sleeping-rooms.

CONTINUAL EASTERS

The life of a true Christian seems to me to be continually full of Easters; to be one perpetual renewal of things from their lower to their higher, from their temporal into their spiritual shape and power. This is the true meaning of the self-sacrifice and self-denial with which the Christian's life is filled. You are called on to give up a luxury, and you do it. The little piece of comfortable living is quietly buried away underground. But that is not the last of it. The small indulgence which would have made your bodily life easier for a day or two, or a year or two, undergoes some strange alteration in its burial, and comes out a spiritual quality that blesses and enriches your soul for ever and ever. You surrender some ambition that had exercised a proud power over you; in whose train and shadow you had hoped to live with something of its glory cast on you. You send that down into its grave, and that too will not rest there. . . . You surrender a dear friend at the call of death, and out of his grave the real power of friendship rises stronger and more eternal into your life. So the partial and imperfect and temporary are always being taken away from us and buried, that the perfect and eternal may arise out of their tombs to bless us.—Phillips Brooks.

Then welcome each rebuff
That turns earth's smoothness rough,
Each sting that bids nor sit nor stand, but go!
Be our joys three parts pain!
Strive and hold cheap the strain;
Learn, nor account the pang; dare, never grudge the throe!
—Browning.

Dear little cooks, with faces clean and bright,
What makes your loaves of bread all so fresh and light?
"We use Cleveland's Baking Powder."
Wise little cooks, now tell me, please, the way
To always have good luck on every baking day?
"Why, use Cleveland's Baking Powder."

The Conversation Corner

DEAR CHILDREN: Those cats are scratching and mewing so at the Corner door that I will let in a few of them, as representatives of the rest. I am almost ashamed to say that one of them has been waiting almost a year for her turn—let her come first.

CONCORD, N. H.

Dear Mr. Martin: Grandma sends us The Congregationalist and we children are interested in the Conversation Corner. Mamma said I could write and ask you how to become a Cornerer. I am ten years old and have a cunning kitten. She is doubled pawed all around. Every morning when mamma comes in the kitchen she jumps on her shoulder and lies around her neck while she gets breakfast. She is maltese and white and her name is Clover. EDITH A.

PELHAM MANOR, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Martin: David received your letter and . . . I have a cat who, I think, is a twin of Bonnie-Joli. His name is Christopher Columbus. We named him that because he came from a far off place (over in the bushes) and came to an unknown place, and because he likes to explore. We have a little dog now but Christopher cannot get used to him. His name is Tag. I inclose a picture of Christopher Columbus for you to see how much he looks like Bonnie-Joli. I had a picture to send to D. F. of David on his bicycle, but when I was all ready to send it I could not find it. Afterwards I found it in papa's pocket. JENNIE C.

Were you then the girl who, when asked what the dead letter office was, said it was her father's pocket? That was a serious matter—David might have got D. F.'s prize if his bicycle had been on time. (D. F. is on time this spring with his own bicycle, riding, he tells me, every day in some great park near his suburban home—and I think it is doing him good.) As your Manor must be near Long Island Sound, perhaps Columbus may have discovered a "Cat Island" in it to escape from Tag! As to his resemblance to the lamented Bonnie-Joli, that must be left to the Editor to decide on.

Alas! the writer of the very next letter in the pile does not speak very complimentarily on that subject:

Mr. Martin: I feel quite aggrieved because I was not asked to that Corner party. I think I could have carried my part in the hish-hash-hosh, and I have not forgotten how to play stage-coach. I fear, however, that if I had been present I might have taken the Editor to task for what I consider ill-treatment of poor Bonnie-Joli. It is not strange that he died when he belonged to nobody, and probably was surfeited sometimes and underfed at others. I am very fond of cats and a neglected one calls out my sympathy at once. A cat near me was sick last summer and its mistress consulted a veterinary who examined it and gave it medicine, and the cat was very much better. Sometime when—if ever—there is a dearth of topics for the Corner, perhaps you will say a good word for that branch of the medical profession which treats suffering animals. I am very glad people are being educated in that way, so that our useful animals, as well as those we keep as pets, may be relieved from pain.

Perhaps some of our Corner boys who cannot decide what "to be" might think of this profession, if they have a bent in any such direction. I suppose when they get their degree it would be F. D. (i. e., Felium Doctor), so that they must be careful and not transpose the letters! The "good word" about suffering animals comes in nicely from the next letters. The first is from a "shut in" near Boston.

You should see my Pussy Willow, the prettiest, silkiest maltese kitten you ever saw, with snowy paws and breast, and one little spot of snow on one side of her mouth. She will take the palm for catching butterflies. She catches them on the wing, jumping often more than a yard into the air. I have one mounted that she brought in unhurt. She has the fine habit of bringing in to show us whatever she catches. At first, wearied with the chase, she would release the butterfly and lie down to rest, when he would immediately fly to the window, pussy following and coming back victorious, with her victim in her mouth. But she soon thought of a better way, deliberately clipping their wings before she let them go, which we think quite wonderful.

Is it a proper question to ask how many of the Cornerers belong to a Band of Mercy? I wonder if people know how much cats suffer for want of water. We always keep plenty of fresh water for ours where she can readily get at it. It is surprising to find how much they drink. So many cats came to drink from our watering-pot in the garden that I made it a point to keep it filled for them. Some come regularly summer and winter.

This reminds me that I have received a beautiful calendar headed, "Band of Mercy Committee of the Junior Christian Endeavor Society," with a note from Miss Olney of Providence, R. I.:

. . . We desire every Junior Society that wishes one to have it, as long as the supply lasts. If you are pleased with the calendar and think it a good thing you may like to mention that Junior Societies can have it by sending the four cents necessary to pay the postage. I shall also be very glad to send our illustrated leaflets to Cornerers who write me for them, inclosing four cents for every ten leaflets wanted. From time to time much is said by the Cornerers about their cats and dogs and other pets, and I hope this subject will be of interest to them. Very cordially yours, E. W. O.

I am sure it will be of interest. The calendar has the Band of Mercy pledge and other appropriate reading, and ought to be in every Junior Society room. There are about ten kinds of leaflets, each with a beautiful picture. I think I like best Only a Cat, A Cat Contemplating a Journey, Man's Faithful Friend (a dog), A Word for Our Woolly Friends and Care of Cows, but you would better send four cents to Miss Olney, 211 Friendship Street (what an appropriate address!), Providence, R. I., and get them all; then you can order afterwards what you prefer. We thank Miss O. for the opportunity for Cornerers to get these pictures and stories about our "Pets."

The next letter has a flavor of "Salem witchcraft" about it (see Corner of Nov. 26), but it must go in:

DANVERS CENTER, MASS.

. . . Sam Parris sends his compliments to Kitty Clover. You asked about Sam's illustrious relatives. Well, his mother's name was Sawdust Amphibia. She it was who drowned herself in a well, and came to life on the shovel just as she was about to be buried—a very remarkable cat. Sawdust's mother came to us from Mr. Whittier, and was on intimate terms with all the Whittier cats—Bathsheba (see Corner Scrap-Book, Feb. 6, 1896), Rip Van Winkle, and the rest. I am not quite sure whether any of those cats are living now or not—I fear not. I do not wish to make comparisons, but I am quite sure that yellow cats are far handsomer than, and greatly superior in intellect to, "malty" cats—the genius of the Corner excepted! N. L. R.

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK

The Boy Office-Seeker. Of all the office-seekers at the national capital the most interesting case is that of a boy twelve years old from the State of New Jersey. I hope it will not turn out to be a mere newspaper story. His name is Garret A. Hobart, Jr. He is evidently a boy with a hobby—a good one. He is a born electrician. He wired his father's house at Patterson, introducing various curious and useful devices, by which the cook could light her kitchen fire by pressing a button at the head of her bed, and the burglar could unfasten the watchdog's chain while attempting to unfasten the window. So, when he went to Washington to see his father inaugurated Vice-President of the United States, he aspired for an office in his own line. Entirely without the knowledge of his father, he asked the President for the position of manager of electric bells at the Executive Mansion. The first the father knew of it was when Mr. McKinley clapped him on the back, saying, "That boy of yours is a treasure! I've just had the pleasure of appointing him electrician of the White House on his own application!" We will make that boy an honorary Cornerer, if he will invent some appliance by which watchdogs may be let loose upon the clamorous office-seekers as they enter the White House grounds!

Li Hung Chang's Gift to an American Girl. Another interesting story is that of a Brooklyn girl, not much older than Garret Hobart, the boy electrician. When the Chinese Viceroy was on his way to a reception in Brooklyn, during his visit to this country last year, she rode on her bicycle near his carriage. On his return from the reception she again kept abreast of his carriage. He asked to have that "little girl in the orange costume" come to his carriage, complimented her riding and invited her to call upon him at the Waldorf. When she called he was resting and she did not see him. This she explained in a letter to him afterwards. He sent her in reply a richly embroidered perfumery bag, with a very remarkable letter, some sentences from which are well worth preserving, as coming from that wise man of the East.

Dear Miss Josephine: . . . I was very sorry to have missed seeing you at the Waldorf Hotel, and still more sorry because you took the trouble to go, and I disappointed you. You know the old saying: "Early to bed and early to rise." Well, I have always acted upon that and am up at 6 o'clock every morning. I think this regular habit has helped to make me healthy, though not very wealthy or wise, but I am content with one of those three blessings.

If I had seen you at the hotel I should certainly have given you a souvenir. I will now make good my neglect. When I got back to China I came here to Peking and saw my Emperor and told him of all I had seen; then I called on the Empress Dowager, who has always been very kind to me. She was much interested in the account of my travels and asked me many questions. Then her Majesty gave me some presents, and among them was a little silk scent bag to hang on my belt. I now send you this pretty little bag and hope it will please you. If you hold it up before your eyes you will see four Chinese words worked in red silk; read them from right to left. They mean: "All things as wished"—that is, may you have everything you want. And I hope you will. But, of course, you must only want what you can get, what you may reasonably expect. . . .

If your parents are living I hope you are dutiful to them. In China children are carefully taught to love them. I think we are more particular about that in China than Western people are, and it has helped much to make China the oldest of nations.

LI HUNG CHANG.

Is not that like the "commandment with promise, that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest live long on the earth"? And how did that man in the land of Confucius come to know our homely proverb of "Early to bed"?

Lesson for April 25 Acts 12

PETER DELIVERED FROM PRISON

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

This chapter shows the perils to the new church from outward foes and the divine protection over it. It suggests the dangers to which the church today is exposed from ungodly men and the ways in which God guards his people. We find here:

1. Persecutions renewed. The brief years had passed in which the Jews had had their attention absorbed by the attempts of Caligula to desecrate their temple. Claudius had succeeded him as Emperor of Rome. Herod was honored by him with the title of king. There were several Herods. Those who figured prominently in New Testament history are as follows: Herod the Great reigned in Judæa when Jesus was born, and sought to kill him. His son, Herod Antipas, reigned in Galilee when Jesus was crucified, and killed John the Baptist. Herod Agrippa I., grandson of Herod the Great and nephew of Herod Antipas, is the king named in this lesson. His son was the Herod before whom Paul defended himself.

Herod Agrippa I. was planning to found an independent empire. He probably cared nothing for the Christian Church. To him it was merely a religious sect of the people he ruled. But he saw that the Jews who had influence hated it, and he was willing to crush it to gain favor with them. The three men who had been first in the affections of Jesus were naturally most prominent in the new church —Peter, James and John. The first blow fell on James. The story of his death is told in two words only, which are translated, "killed with the sword." He had lived in close intimacy with his Master, had witnessed the raising of Jairus's daughter, had been present at the transfiguration on the mount and at the agony in the garden. He knew what glory was and what suffering was in the service of Christ. He had asked that he might share the glory, and had declared that he could drink the cup of suffering [Matt. 20: 22]. He drank the cup. We may be sure that one so loved by Christ has shared his glory. Why was one of these two brothers the first of the apostles to die in his youth, while the other lived to old age and survived them all? We can no more answer this question than we can tell why James was left in the hands of Herod, while Peter was delivered. Each had his appointed work, and did it under the same divine guidance.

This generation has had heroes who have died for Christ's sake as nobly as did James. Such names as those of Livingstone, Patteson' Hannington and Mackay are worthy to be placed beside that of the martyred apostle, with many others whose deeds have never been written and whose deaths have been as briefly chronicled as was that of James. Doubtless there are children in our Sunday schools studying this lesson who will have the ambition and offer the prayer of James and, like him, drink the cup of suffering and share the glory of Christ.

When Herod saw that the killing of James had strengthened his plans by the support of the Jews, naturally he next arrested Peter. But he knew that it would not please the Jews to put him to death during their Passover feast, for they held it unlawful to execute criminals at that time. He therefore cast Peter into prison, guarded by sixteen soldiers, planning to put him to death publicly as soon as the Passover should be ended. Both Roman and Jewish authorities were now against the church and had its chief leader in their power. How often since then has the church been arrayed against the forces in the world, with no resource left but to call on God for help, and how great have been the deliverances when all other help seemed to be in vain!

2. The church praying for Peter. The disciples met in companies and pleaded for the deliverance of their leader. No doubt they used all the arguments which pressed on their hearts. They urged that Peter knew of Christ's teachings which they had not yet learned from him; that he held the confidence of many, who, without his presence, might abandon their faith; that he was the spiritual father of the young churches, most of which he had organized. Above all, he was beloved by the whole body of disciples, and they cried to the heart of God to save him. This is prayer—the need of those who are bent on serving God for men and means to do their work; the fear lest their aims should be defeated and precious souls hurt or destroyed; and especially personal affection for one who can further these ends but whose life is threatened—all finding utterance in petitions to God who is able to deliver. There seems to have been no opportunity to pray for James. His death came without warning. But whether prayer, if there had been time for it, would have saved him from death or not, it is certain that without prayer the church would die and faith would cease. Christ has taught us no more essential truth than that men "ought always to pray."

3. The prayer answered. All true prayer is answered, though not always in the affirmative. But these prayers were answered according to the desires of those who prayed. Let us fix that fact in our minds. They were answered, too, when to human eyes it seemed impossible. Peter was in prison, chained to two soldiers, with two more standing on guard. The whole force of government supported these soldiers, and popular desire was on the side of government. The church was helpless both before law and public sentiment. Yet Peter's chains fell off. He was led out of his cell, out of the wardroom, out of the great iron gate into the street, and there he found himself alone.

The picture of the surprise in the house of Mark's mother when Peter was heard at the gate, the glad reiteration of Rhoda that he was really there, and the joyful astonishment of the praying disciples, is one of the most artless and inspiring in the New Testament. We need not blame the disciples for not believing that Peter was really there, though they were praying in faith that he might appear. He had not himself realized that he was free till he found himself in the street alone. Up to that time he thought his experience was only a vision such as he had seen on the housetop in Joppa. Not all good gifts asked for are realized at once when they are received. We must not be turned aside from the great fact that the church at prayer has received from God blessings too great for faith to grasp at once, yet that it has grown strong by such experiences, and that still greater triumphs are before it for the asking.

Let us remember, also, that we are invited to ask God for what we want, with the assurance that what is not possible to men is easy to him. During the War of the Rebellion one army was so surrounded by the opposing forces that escape seemed impossible. "We have got them now," said the advancing general, "and they know it. God Almighty himself cannot save them." His officers agreed with him. But their enemies were led by a praying man, who had spent an hour in his tent that morning asking for deliverance from God. That same evening he was in his tent giving thanks for victory. God Almighty had saved them.

Let us, then, ask God for victory for his church, for the salvation of souls, for deliverance of those in the grasp of Satan, for the enlightenment of those who sit in darkness, for the overthrow of those who fight against his kingdom. What triumphs every year brings in answer to prayer! When last year began ominous threats of war disturbed two nations who held a common faith in God. The churches of England and America united in prayer for peace, with an answer larger than they had faith to ask for. Blessed be perils that drive God's children to their knees and teach them the meaning of the promise, "Ask and it shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you."

Constant Decrease in Receipts. Month by month we are compelled to record the falling off in the receipts of the American Board until the total decrease for seven months as compared with the same period last year comes very near to reaching the appalling sum $50,000. Every item in this month's table statistics is depressing.

Tank Missionary Home Opened. Another home for foreign missionaries' children who are receiving their education in this country was opened in Oberlin, April 2. The first building for this purpose, Judson Cottage, provided by the Oberlin Missionary Home Association in 1892, at a cost of $2,500, soon proved too small to accommodate the growing missionary family and about a year ago it was decided to erect the new house. It bears the name of Mrs. C. L. A. Tank, a lady belonging to a noble Holland family, who resided for many years in Green Bay, Wis. She became interested in the missionary home through the influence of Rev. Jeremiah Porter and in her will bequeathed $10,000 for building and endowment. The new house is a handsome, three-story building in the Queen Anne style. The first two floors contain twenty-eight rooms, furnishing accommodations for thirty children. The cost of the house without furnishings was about $15,000, of which all but $1,500 has already been received. The sum paid for the board of the children goes far toward providing the running expenses. To meet the balance it is desired to raise the present endowment to $20,000. At the opening reception addresses were made by Rev. Dr. H. M. Tenney, president of the association, and others. The occasion was made peculiarly tender by the near departure of some of the missionaries present. They declared that such a provision for their children does much to mitigate the separation which is one of the sorest trials of a foreign missionary's lot.

Denominational Lines Disregarded. Very quietly but with marked results has a religious work gone forward in Aintab during these troublous times which, according to one of our correspondents, "is altogether without a parallel in the history of the Turkish missions." Certainly, a few years ago our missionaries would never have dreamed of such harmonious and helpful fellowship between Gregorians and Protestants as is reported by Dr. Fuller. An immediate result of the massacre and pillage of November, 1895, was a noticeable increase in church attendance. The danger and difficulty of crossing the city, as well as the fellowship of a common suffering, inclined many Christians to seek the place of worship nearest their homes, without much regard to denominational lines. This led to mutual arrangements between Protestants and Gregorians to meet the larger spiritual wants of the people. At the First Church an abridged Gregorian service under the direction of a priest preceded the regular Protestant service. Such was the variety and novelty it introduced, and such the eagerness of the people to join in worship, that this double service, held twice daily for eleven months, was well attended, the interest always culminating in the Protestant sermon. At the purely Protestant services in two other churches the Gregorians have not infrequently outnumbered the Protestants. Yet more remarkable has been the opening of the great Gregorian church to Protestant pastors or professors of Aintab College. The usual congregations have ranged from 3,000 to 5,000 persons, and during special seasons services, both Protestant and Gregorian, are held daily. A Sunday school has been organized in this church with an average attendance of 850 pupils, as well as a young men's Bible class of seventy members. As a result of this special activity and co-operation on the part of both branches of the Christian Church, the moral tone of the community has been raised along the lines of Sunday observance, temperance and social reform, while the spiritual quickening and uplift can hardly be estimated.

A Church at Mt. Silinda. An interesting letter from Dr. W. L. Thompson, dated Jan. 13, reports the organization of the first church at Mt. Silinda, the principal station of the American Board's Gazaland Mission, East Africa It has sixteen members, thirteen being natives, one the son of a Zulu helper and the other two children in a missionary family. Dr. Thompson writes: "It was an occasion of joy to us and will no doubt be to all who have followed the establishment and progress of this mission. Not that this is the first evidence we have had that our labors have not been in vain, but it is, as it were, a summing up of results. Our hearts were joyful as we looked upon these young people, born and reared in the darkness of paganism, who have now caught a glimmer of the light of life and are ready to express their determination to press forward unto the perfect day. But we were also impressed with a feeling of responsibility and anxiety as we thought of the forces of evil which they must meet. Because of famine, war and pestilence in the regions about us, this section has been so short of food and so isolated from any outside source of supply that it is impossible for us to provide for these young men, so a large proportion must return to their homes, 100 miles distant in the lowlands to the east of us." Although the Prudential Committee has refused the means to extend the work into this lowland region, there is hope that these young Christians may be witnesses for Christ among their own people.

THE WORLD AROUND

Protestants Terrorized in Madagascar. Patience, forbearance and tolerance, to a marked degree, have characterized the attitude of the London Missionary Society toward the French Government in Madagascar, but in view of present distressing developments the directors feel compelled to publish certain facts and to appeal to all true friends of religious liberty. In a special pamphlet, entitled The Troubles of Malagasy Protestants, extracts from correspondence are given to show the efforts being made by the Jesuits, with the sanction, and even with the support, of the French officials, to terrorize the poor Malagasy into becoming Roman Catholics, and to get possession of the churches in the country. The French declarations of religious liberty are being constantly violated, and it is stated on good authority that the governor has publicly announced that Protestants are the fahavalo (enemies) of France. We have already given some instances of the outrageous acts of aggression on the part of the Jesuits in seizing Protestant chapels. The means taken to terrorize the people are even more unscrupulous. In some villages the priest has gone from house to house with two books to take the occupants' names, telling them that all written as Roman Catholics in the one will be perfectly safe, while those in the other will be exposed to all sorts of danger and suspicion. Accusations on the most flimsy pretenses are brought against pastors, evangelists and others in country districts, and they are heavily fined, imprisoned and some are now loaded with chains, though it is certain that their Protestantism is their only offense. We cannot believe that British sentiment will allow this state of affairs to continue. The L. M. S. has taken a noteworthy step in arranging to have its foreign secretary, Rev. R. W. Thompson, now on his way to New Guinea, visit the Madagascar mission.

Student Movement in Japan. The last number of The Japan Evangelist is almost wholly occupied with articles on Mr. J. R. Mott's work in Japan in connection with the Student Christian Movement. Peculiar tact, untiring energy and broad sympathy were required to deal with the students in Japanese universities. It was a delicate task, for instance, to persuade the members of the Imperial University Y. M. C. Association to reorganize upon the regular evangelical basis. Mr. Mott not only addressed thousands of students in nearly all the principal institutions of learning, organizing or reorganizing college Y. M. C. Associations, but to crown all he succeeded in uniting these associations as the Student Young Men's Christian Association Union of Japan. This is founded upon a thoroughly evangelical basis, one of its chief objects being "to spread Christian knowledge among students and to lead students to be disciples of Jesus Christ as the only Saviour, true God and true man." If this movement is rightly developed it has great possibilities. At present this seems to be the only way to reach students in the government schools.

The new ambassador from the United States to Great Britain, Hon. John Hay, is a Christian hymn writer, a fact which deserves to be remembered. He wrote for the great international Y. P. S. C. E. convention in Washington the following hymn:

INVOCATION.

Lord! from far severed climes we come,
To meet at last in thee, our home.
Thou who hast been our guide and guard,
Be still our hope, our rich reward.

Defend us, Lord, from every ill;
Strengthen our hearts to do thy will.
In all we plan and all we do
Still keep us to thy service true.

O, let us hear the inspiring word
Which they of old at Horeb heard.
Breathe to our hearts the high command,
"Go onward and possess the land!"

Thou who art light shine on each soul!
Thou who art truth each mind control.
Open our eyes and make us see
The path which leads to heaven and thee.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES

Twenty county evangelistic superintendents have been appointed in Pennsylvania.

All the societies in Toronto are urged to take part in a campaign against Sunday street cars in that city.

Five hundred dollars for foreign missions was given last year by the society in Park Street Church, Boston, in addition to $100 for city missions and special gifts for a home missionary, for a colored student and for sailors.

Missouri State officers are urging each society in the State to form a new society before the San Francisco convention, and the Junior superintendent of Texas asks each society in that State to form a Junior Society by April 15.

To aid Christian Endeavor in Sweden, any Endeavorers attending the Stockholm exhibition the coming summer should correspond with Mr. August Palm, care Messrs. Palm and Stadling, 15 Malms Kilnadsgalan, Stockholm, Sweden.

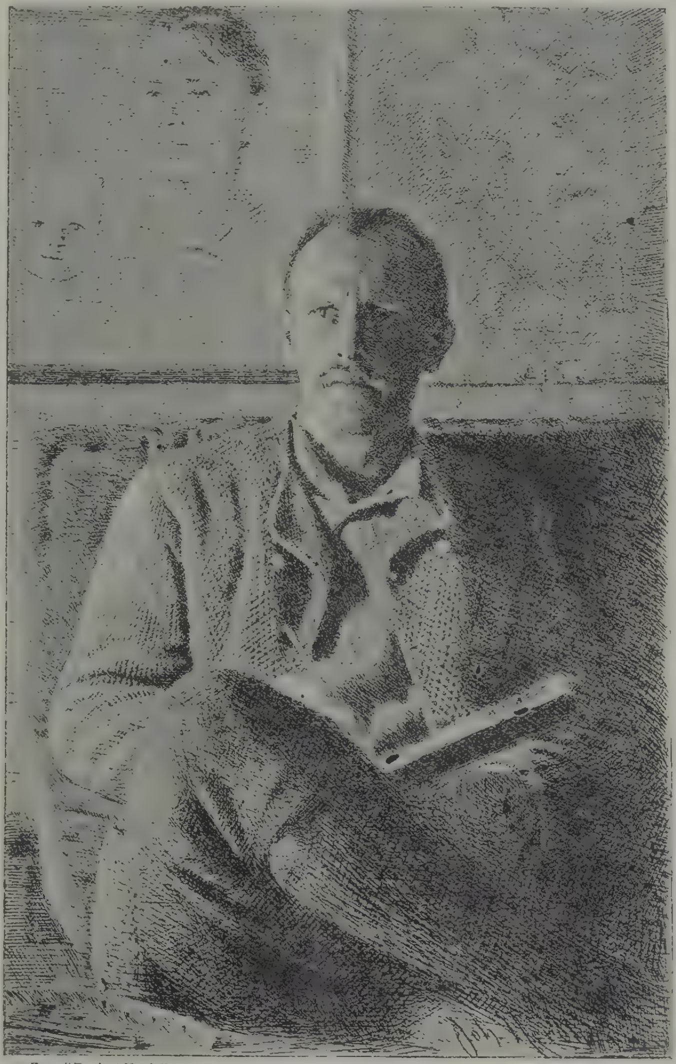
The society in the Union Church, Boston, has promised $500 for missions this year, and pledges to give systematically are being circulated. The society at Woburn, Mass., is giving $500 for the support of a missionary. The members were divided into five sections, numbering about twenty each, and each section raised $100. The society of the Park Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., gave about $300 for benevolence last year.

The two principal meeting places at the San Francisco Convention will be Woodward's Pavilion, capable of seating about 6,000 persons, and Mechanics' Pavilion, at a distance of about 10 minutes' walk. The State headquarters will be at Mechanics' Pavilion. Within it will be constructed a hall seating from 7,500 to 10,000 and surrounded by sound-proof partitions. More than three-fifths of the $25,000 needed for the convention will be contributed by the business men of San Francisco.

Literature

Nansen's Farthest North

This elegant work in two large volumes, richly illustrated, embodies the experiences and the records of Dr. Fridtjof Nansen's famous exploring expedition in search of the north pole. In some respects this was the most remarkable Arctic expedition ever made. The author's theory was novel, that is, that an ocean current runs through the polar regions, by taking advantage of which it is possible to drift from the region of Spitzbergen toward, and perhaps close to, the pole, and thus across and down into the vicinity of Greenland. Secondly he believed it possible to construct a ship so solidly and in such form that instead of being crushed by the ice pack, as usually has been the misfortune of exploring vessels, she should be merely lifted by the ice and sustained thereon, and drifted along as a part of it until she should finally emerge in the open sea, and that such a vessel could be so equipped that her occupants might live during their tedious trip, which must necessarily employ several years, in absolute health and comfort. These theories, which were condemned almost unanimously by Dr. Nansen's predecessors in Arctic expeditions, were vindicated triumphantly.



From "Farthest North" Copyright, 1897, by Harper & Brothers.

He carried out his plan in so large a degree that its reasonableness may be said to have been justified. The polar current was found to exist, but, so far as he was able to discover, not to run as close to the pole itself as was anticipated, and the drift on which he depended proved to be, during the years of his experience, so slow that an excessive time would have been required to carry out the plan completely, if it could have been carried out at all, which seems improbable. The expedition was gone three years. During the first two Nansen remained with the party and reached the latitude of 84° N., then, being convinced that the drift was not likely to be close to the pole and that, if he were to reach it or its vicinity it must be by a sledging expedition, he took one companion, Hjalmar Johansen, and a number of dogs, and with sledges made a bold spurt on foot into the north, reaching in this manner the latitude of 86° 15′ N., the highest ever attained by explorers, and probably never before reached by human beings at all.

The surface of the ice proved to be so excessively confused and broken as to render progress almost impossible after a time, and at last, not because of any failure of his pertinacious courage, but because of the inevitable diminution of provisions and of the strength of his dogs, upon whose vigor the success of the trip depended so much, he turned back. Of course it was impossible to find the ship again, and he made directly south for the Spitzbergen coast. After a year of most terrible privations and of hairbreadth escapes without number, he and his companion, by virtue of a coolness, daring and energy certainly unsurpassed in the brilliant record of human achievements, having spent a whole winter in a tiny hut which they reared, and having lived during that time on the meat and blubber of such bears and walruses as they had been able to shoot in the fall, at last reached Franz Josef Land, and there, fortunately, found an English gentleman with his yacht, himself an amateur Northern explorer. Of course then their return was safe and easy.

Meanwhile the ship had been drifting, but at last, it having become evident that the drift would not take it near the pole and that little more remained to be accomplished in the way of scientific discovery in accordance with Dr. Nansen's orders, Captain Sverdrup succeeded in breaking out of the ice and in returning to Norway. The famous ship, the Fram, also triumphantly vindicated the theory of Dr. Nansen and her builders. She endured the terrific pressure of the ice for three winters absolutely unharmed, being lifted and sustained by the ice, sometimes at a considerable incline, and never becoming unseaworthy or uninhabitable, and she returned to port as sound as she left it.

The expedition, although it failed to reach the pole, accomplished a great deal of large scientific importance. Constant observations were maintained—astronomical, meteorological, botanical, geological, and with reference to the currents and life of the polar ocean as opportunity served. These researches were carried on with conscientious and successful fidelity and many additions to scientific knowledge are the result. It seems to be demonstrated by the information obtained that there is no land at the pole, as many have supposed, but that the region is covered by a frozen ocean of much greater depth than commonly has been supposed. Indeed, although there would be a certain gratification in being able to say that the pole itself has been reached by mankind, it is doubtful if any expedition which should actually attain the north pole would bring back any more information of value than the Nansen expedition secured. Moreover, there is no occasion hereafter for Arctic explorations to be regarded as involving extreme hardship for healthy and energetic men, except so far as concerns the inevitable risk of occasional frost bites, immersion in the ocean, attacks of polar animals and some peril from the encroaching ice pack. None of these proved serious to the occupants of the Fram, although they had some narrow escapes. Almost the only perils of any consequence were those which beset Dr. Nansen and his companion while they were sledging. It is interesting to read of the ease, comfort and almost luxury which the ship's company enjoyed during these three years. It is gratifying to know that the hardships of Arctic life may be so softened by proper preparation.

This method of attacking the polar problem must be conceded to have been demonstrated as safe and in a large measure practicable. Its great objection is the long period of time required. Perhaps a second attempt would carry such a ship to a point from which sledging expeditions might successfully reach the pole. Yet we cannot help feeling that the other method which has been suggested, and is likely to be attempted before long, is on the whole the surest, that is to say, the establishment of stations fifty miles or so apart, each one equipped deliberately and thoroughly, so far as the shifting ice renders this possible, and thus slowly, by a process of gradual approach, reaching a point in safety from which the pole may be actually gained. The hindrance to the success of this method lies in the fact that if the pole be surrounded by water, as now seems probable, the constant changing of the ice might render the establishment of stations difficult, if not impossible. Given a season of sufficient cold (40 degrees below zero evidently cannot be relied upon to solidify the ice enough to prevent the wind from breaking it up and re-forming it) and the method of gradual approach might succeed. The narrative, which contains an appendix by Captain Sverdrup, who remained in charge of the Fram after Nansen's departure, is minutely detailed and freely illustrated and is of intense interest. The health of the thirteen members of the expedition was almost invariably perfect. No trace of scurvy appeared among them. Their supplies were ample and the completeness and wisdom of their preparations hardly could have been increased. They undertook a colossal task in the most gallant and self-sacrificing spirit. They performed it with unwavering cheerfulness and courage, and all the world will rejoice that every one of them came home well and hearty and with the consciousness of having accomplished an exploit of unusual brilliancy and of having also added largely to the scientific knowledge of the human race. IN EXCELSIS

Upon examining this new hymn-book our first impression was that it contains too many new hymns and tunes, new, at least, in the sense of being unfamiliar as yet to our Congregational churches. Certainly there are many such. But the more we have studied the book, the more this impression has been modified. We still miss many familiar hymns, such as those beginning, "Awake our souls, away our fears," "Come kingdom of our God," "Early, my God, without delay," "Faint not, Christian, though the road," "He leadeth me, O blessed thought," "He lives, the Great Redeemer lives," "If through unruffled seas," "Jesus calls us o'er the tumult," "O eyes that are weary and hearts that are faint," "Servant of God, well done," "Stand up, my soul, shake off thy fears," "Thine earthly Sabbaths, Lord, we love," "Thus far the Lord has led me on," "When thou, my righteous judge, shalt come," and others. They belong to the established body of hymnology, in this country at least, and are dear to so many Christian hearts that no book which omits them can appeal as strongly to the religious public, especially to the middle aged and elderly portion, as if it contained them. The same large class of persons will miss exceedingly such tunes as Balerma, Downs, Geer, Heber, Ortonville, Siloam, St. Martins, Anvern, Dwight, Mendon, Horton, Greenville, Brattle St., Rhine and others.

The younger generation in our churches, although generally familiar with these hymns and tunes, of course has not so many tender spiritual associations with them, and moreover has been familiarized to a greater degree with such modern music, largely of foreign origin, as abounds in this book. The present tendency doubtless is towards the adoption increasingly of music of the latter sort, and we do not oppose it, yet we cannot but regret that many of the hymns and tunes which we have mentioned were not retained in this work. Nevertheless there is enough of familiar material to afford most people comfort and profit in the use of the book. We have found the degree of innovation to be much less than we at first supposed it to be, and, in themselves considered, the newer hymnology and the newer music here represented are excellent. We have seen hymn-books in which the tendency to introduce novelty chiefly for the sake of novelty seemed to be plain, but that charge cannot be made against this work. Its editors and publishers have sought to blend the old and the new in just and attractive proportions, and they have produced an admirable book.

The music, so far as it is comparatively new, is drawn from classic and standard composers, such as Barnby, Dykes, Garrett, Gauntlett, Hopkins, Mason, Monk, Smart, Stainer and Sullivan, and it illustrates the advance which has been made in the last fifty years in sacred composition of this class. But we regret that so many hymns are inserted two or three times to different tunes, and we wish the space had been devoted to some of the hymns and tunes which we have mentioned as having been omitted. The book thus made up would have been better than it is now. Moreover, too many hymns and tunes which have been associated together, certainly in the experience of most American Christians, until neither can be suggested without the other being recalled, are separated in this edition. A hymn thus identified with a particular tune never seems quite itself when sung to another tune, and, although, of course, it is possible to sing any hymn to any tune in the same meter, it is a blemish on a hymn-book when the separation of hymns and tunes customarily associated together occurs. On the whole, nevertheless, we give the book hearty commendation. It sets a high standard, not only for American churches but for those anywhere, and many a tune in it at first will seem to be difficult, but no ordinary choir need have trouble in mastering anything in it, and there is abundance of simple and beautiful music. It is well that the tendency of sacred song, both in respect to words and tunes, should be upward. The standard books of only a generation ago contained too much poetry that was hardly more than third-rate in quality, sometimes almost doggerel, and too many tunes which lacked dignity and appropriateness. Defects of this sort cannot be found in the work before us. If not actually the very best, it is one of the two or three best hymn-books which have been issued in the United States, and is destined, we have no doubt, to a large and lasting popularity. There are 858 hymns in it, each of which is set to one tune and some to more than one. There also are a few supplementary hymns and about forty supplementary tunes. A few selections for chanting are included. The volume is carefully and thoroughly indexed. It contains the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments, and is handsomely gotten up in respect to paper, type and binding. In practical service it will answer the purposes of all sorts of churches successfully. [Century Co. $1.35.]

RELIGIOUS

Prof. J. M. Stifler in his commentary on the Epistle to the Romans [F. H. Revell Co. $1.25] has aimed chiefly to make the epistle better understood. He has not sought to advocate any special system or theory, keeping in mind first Paul's point of view, and secondly the connection of thought. He has excluded needless exposition and has conscientiously subordinated himself to the revelation of the precise meaning of the apostle. He takes up the epistle chapter by chapter and verse by verse, and seems to avoid superfluous and commonplace comment successfully and to afford intelligent and valuable aid to the comprehension of its significance. He does not hesitate to indicate his own opinion, of course, but is loyal to the purpose above stated. The Biblical student will find this difficult epistle the more easy to be comprehended in connection with the use of this work. It is scholarly and valuable.——Dr. J. R. Smyth in his little volume, The Divine Library, Suggestions How to Read the Bible [James Pott & Co. 50 cents], has prepared a serviceable book of suggestions which is adapted to the needs of a very wide circle of readers. Without being pedantic, it gives timely and telling hints, and those who avail themselves of them will gain new pleasure and profit from the pages of their Bibles.——How to Read the Bible [Thomas Whittaker. 50 cents], by Prof. W. F. Adeney, undertakes very much the same sort of work for the same large class of readers, i. e., Sunday school teachers and Bible students. It is somewhat clearer in plan and approaches the subject from a different point of view and more in detail. It is a thoroughly serviceable little treatise.

Abbott's Comments on the Revelation of Jesus Christ [75 cents] appears to be published by its author, Mr. J. H. Abbott of Cleveland, O. It contains his impressions in regard to the meaning of the book of Revelation, the text of which book is in heavier type, thus being distinguished from the comments. The latter are brief, positive and often original. Mr. Abbott identifies Babylon with modern society, and believes that the "terrible day of the Lord" is almost upon us. A new kingdom of Israel, he holds, is to be established in Palestine and the millennium is near at hand. The book has something of the interest which attaches to the effort of any earnest mind to ascertain truth.——The Clock of Nature [Thomas Whittaker. $1.50], by Rev. Dr. Hugh Macmillan, contains a series of discourses, examples of his regular pulpit work and intended in the first instance for young people. Some of them have been printed already, others appear for the first time. They are based upon the parable of the fig tree, and they use the suggestions of nature to interpret and enforce spiritual truth. They are short, graphic, devout and interesting.

MISCELLANEOUS

Prof. Willis Boughton, in his History of Ancient Peoples [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.00], has published what may be called a summary of the Story of the Nations series, which the same publishers have been issuing for several years. His purpose, admirable in itself, has been carried out as well as possible, although in the nature of the case it has been necessary to employ condensation to an almost painful degree. He has succeeded unexpectedly well in preserving the form of a readable narrative and the essential features of the several histories upon which his work is based. The book is admirably gotten up in all respects, contains valuable lists and tables and will serve finely not only as a summary of, but as an introduction to, the excellent series with which it really belongs.

The Story of the Birds [D. Appleton & Co. 65 cents], by J. N. Baskett, is a study of bird life from the naturalist's, rather than the popular, point of view, yet it is by no means devoid of interest, but will prove most attractive to students of the actual structure and history of birds rather than their mere habits. It is learned, without failing to be intelligible to common readers, and is freely illustrated.

Another book about birds is Olive Thorne Miller's Upon the Tree Tops [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1 25], illustrated by J. C. Beard. Mrs. Miller's learning, also, is evident, but here is confined almost wholly to the habits of birds and to her own experiences as an observer. Her book is in the narrative form, and her own personality and literary abilities have controlled its form. It is exceedingly entertaining, and no reader can help having his interest in bird life reawakened and his knowledge of it more or less enlarged.

The Fern Collectors Hand Book and Herbarium [Henry Holt & Co. $2.25], by Sadie F. Prince, will be appreciated highly by fern collectors. The diagrams have been prepared with such fidelity and skill that there is no mistaking them, and collectors may compare at their ease, and the specimens, after having been dried and pressed, may be attached successfully to the page opposite the illustration. The volume needs little description, but is admirably adapted to its purpose.

Mr. Russell Sturgis and Mr. E. E. Krebiehl are the authors of an Annotated Bibliography of the Fine Arts [Library Bureau. $1.00], which Mr. George Iles has edited. It covers the departments of painting, sculpture and architecture, the arts of decoration and illustration and music, Mr. Krebiehl being responsible for the musical portion and Dr. Sturgis for the preceding. It is a work comprehensive and well arranged, and of very great value to students of the branches indicated. A cheaper edition in paper covers can be had for 50 cents. ——Mr. Laurence Hutton's Literary Landmarks of Rome [Harper & Bros. $1.00] is closely akin to his Literary Landmarks of Florence, which we recently noted. It describes the historic houses of ancient Roman authors and some of the residences of men of modern fame, and gives considerable gossip of an appropriate character about literary and artistic people. Those who know, or who hope to know, Rome well will enjoy it.

The Law of Married Women in Massachusetts [Little, Brown & Co. $2.00], by G. A. O. Ernst, is a carefully compiled and studied treatise of much practical merit. It deals with the various aspects of the relation of married women to others, such as antemarriage compacts, the right of woman to her own property and to carry on business for herself, her relations to her husband in respect to support, legal obligations, etc., her power of disposing of her property and even her rights of burial. The subject is covered carefully and intelligently, and such a book often will prove of great aid to those who desire to learn exactly what the law provides or prohibits in this State.——Modern Book Keeping [Maynard, Merrill & Co. 80 cents], by J. L. Montgomery, is so well arranged, intelligently written and attractively printed that it is likely to be accepted by all who desire such a book, either for study or reference, as one of the best.

The movement now in progress for the endowment of Mt. Holyoke College is giving rise to some valuable pamphlet literature designed to make clearer to this generation the spirit and purpose that prompted the starting of the institution. A Holyoke woman, who prefers to remain unknown, has put together, between white covers, with the title The Inception of Mt. Holyoke College, a number of letters written by Miss Lyon between the years 1831 and 1837 to Miss Grant, who was so closely associated with her, to Professor Hitchcock, to her own mother and to others with whom she shared her hopes and fears in those critical and anxious days. It is worth the while of all who have at heart a symmetrical training of the youth of this generation to read these letters. They show how deep was the religious impulse that prompted the undertaking and that sustained Miss Lyon in the hardships encountered in carrying it to success. It is interesting to see that she relied much upon the small contributions of persons in moderate circumstances. "The great and honorable," she says, "will not listen to our cause, but perhaps the more humble in life may befriend this important object."

Another equally attractive pamphlet is Rev. Oliver Huckel's address, delivered in Amherst, Feb. 28, when the First Church and the citizens of the town united in commemorating Miss Lyon's centennial. This address is entitled The Higher Education and the Common People. It is a broad and discriminating treatment of the remarkable movement early in the century, out of which sprung the educational institutions that are now the glory of Western Massachusetts. One of the facts brought to light, and deserving ever to be made conspicuous whenever the subject is considered, is this, that the primary and avowed object of these institutions was to increase the religious zeal of those who should be educated therein, and to equip them for nobler service in the world.

The Satchel Guide to Europe for 1897 [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50] has been revised, as usual, and is out in the customary convenient and tasteful form. It is certainly smaller than it used to be, which is an advantage. For one who is going abroad for the first time and who desires to make the trip which more than any other most people commonly make at first, and which for many reasons probably is the best trip to be made at first, this is a sufficient and a quite satisfactory guide-book, and all travelers who continue to depend upon guide-books will find in it much of value.——The Majestic Family Cook Book [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50], by Adolph Gallier, is not noticeably majestic in appearance, and we doubt if its circulation is intended to be strictly confined to majestic families. In other words, the name is an absurdity, but as an ordinary cook-book for the use of households in which a first-rate table is set it is an excellent and serviceable work. We question if families in which economy must be studied with some care will find it as serviceable as those where the cost of food is a less vital feature, yet many of the recipes relate to common and easily procured dishes. The book is handsomely printed and is substantial.

MORE APRIL MAGAZINES

The Review of Reviews [$2.50] presents two interesting pictures, one of President McKinley and his Cabinet, and the other of ex-President Cleveland and his Cabinet. The members of President McKinley's Cabinet are the subjects of character sketches accompanied by portraits, and likenesses also are given of nearly all the appointees to prominent governmental positions. Current events during the month have been so exceptionally important that the department called Progress of the World is more than ordinarily interesting. The paper in which British and American cabinet systems are compared also has a peculiar interest just now. President Thwing contributes a paper on Elements in the Choice of a College and G. E. Hooker one on Cleaning Streets by Contract. The timeliness and solid practical value of this review is increasingly apparent with every issue.

In the Century [$4 00] the frontispiece shows the newly-finished tomb of General Grant in New York city. General Porter's papers on Campaigning with Grant, and other contributions about the latter by General Sherman, Col. F. D. Grant, G. W. Grannis, J. R. Proctor and Hon. J. A. Kasson, are appropriately included. A striking article is that on New Conditions in South Africa, by E. J. Glave, the explorer. Two newly discovered portraits of Jeanne D'Arc are reproduced. Mention also should be made of Old Georgetown, a Social Panorama, by G. W. Palmer. Col. G. E. Waring, Jr., has a pleasant paper on Wheeling in Tyrolean Valleys, and there are several good poems.

In Scribner's [$3.00] Cosmo Monkhouse has a charming illustrated paper on William Quiller Orchardson, R. A.; L. M. Iddings describes the art of travel with special reference to crossing the ocean; Henry van Dyke has an enjoyable poem on the Maryland Yellowthroat; C. D. Gibson's third paper on London and F. B. Sanborn's Odysseus and Trelawney, a sequel to Byron's Grecian career, also are conspicuous. W. E. D. Scott supplies a short paper with excellent pictures of certain birds. Richard Harding Davis's Soldier of Fortune and Mr. Howells's Story of a Play are continued agreeably, and the minor departments are as good as usual.

The International Journal of Ethics [$2.50] is appropriately grave and edifying. The Psychology of Social Progress, The Moral Life of the Early Romans, Social Life and Morality in India, The Religious Training of Children, Law and Nature in Greek Ethics, and Duty are described by Helen Bosanquet, Frank Granger, Muhammad Abdul Ghani, Abraham Flexner, John Burnett and Henry Sturt. Mr. Flexner favors uniting religious and secular training in the schools, and we believe, with him, that to do so in a manner free from any real objectionableness is quite possible. The departments of discussion and Book Reviews have their own peculiar interest and value.

Among the contributors to The Month [$1.00] who write over their own signature are General Greely, W. I. Fletcher, Frederick Keppel and G. S. Lee. Among the portraits are those of Captain Mahan, Byron, Ibsen, Nansen and his company, Prof. Woodrow Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Cleveland, Thomas Hardy and Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher. It is a bright and readable number.——The Art Amateur [$4.00] is full of current news, the recent Copley Hall exhibition in this city having considerable space. It contains, also, as usual, much in the way of practical information and suggestion about various departments of art for the benefit of beginners. There is also a great deal of miscellaneous art news. Those who are furnishing their homes may find many valuable hints in this publication. It is an admirable all-round art magazine.

The Book Buyer [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.00] is as newsy and charming as ever, and no person of literary tastes can well afford not to see it. A striking feature is the continued bibliography of the earlier editions of Mr. Howells's works.——Book News [John Wanamaker. 50 cents] is another diversified, entertaining, readable and suggestive literary magazine, which we are always glad to welcome.——The International is one of the cheaper monthlies and is sold at ten cents a copy and is well gotten up. The contents this time are all by foreign writers, certainly not widely known in this country, but evidently capable of good work——The Chap-Book [$2.00] preserves its vigor and vivacity and does not lose the peculiar tone which has characterized it from the first. Its merits are marked and it seems to have outgrown its most conspicuous faults.

In Education [$3.00] an article by R. P. St. John, a paper by Mrs. Moses Smith on Mary Lyon, Greek in Modern Education by Prof. J. H. T. Main, and The Museum as an Educational Institution by O. C. Farrington are the most prominent features. Professor Main urges with good effect the importance of the study of Greek, and Mr. Farrington's paper also is exceedingly valuable.——The Homiletic Review [$3 00] presents its usual assortment of material to its clerical readers in substantially the familiar manner. We notice no special features.——The American Kitchen Magazine [$1.00] is not wholly devoted to cooking, but that subject dominates it and the editors, in spite of the limited range, know how to make a tempting publication.

NOTES

—— Dr. James Stalker probably is to be the biographer of the late Prof. Henry Drummond.

—— Mark Twain is in London, writing up his recent travels in South Africa, Australia and India in somewhat the same vein as that of his Innocents Abroad.

—— Ex-President Harrison's recent contributions to the Ladies' Home Journal on the Constitution and Government of the United States are soon to appear in a volume.

—— The late William T. Adams—"Oliver Optic"—wrote 116 books, not counting the nine volumes of Oliver Optic's Magazine, which he edited from 1867 to 1875. His stories are said to have sold to the extent of 500,000 copies.

—— An American edition of the London Studio is to be issued by John Lane of 140 Fifth Avenue, New York, simultaneously with the English edition. It is to be identical with the latter, excepting that it is to have a special cover design by W. H. Bradley, and an American supplement, conducted by Ernest Knaufft.

—— An expurgated edition of Miss Alcott's Little Women is to be issued by a sensitive British publisher, all distinctive "Americanisms" being omitted. We shall await the result with considerable interest, and the more because hardly a supposed "Americanism" can be named which is not to be heard commonly somewhere in England.

—— The forthcoming volume of hitherto unpublished letters by Burns will contain his correspondence with Mrs. Dunlop who, for a long time, was an intimate friend of the poet, but at last had a disagreement with him. Something like a hundred of her letters to him also never have been published, but are to be made public soon. The two collections should be brought out together.

—— The London correspondent of The Book Buyer thinks that memorials of deceased literary men do not arouse wide interest in England at present. He supports his opinion by pointing out that the Tennyson memorial has not awakened much interest, while the Browning Settlement in London depends upon a few enthusiasts, and the Carlyle house in Chelsea was barely rescued, while the Carlyle memorial fund in Edinburgh makes small progress. Stevenson's memorial is the only one to be received with much favor of late.

SOMETHING FOR ENDEAVORERS TO ANTICIPATE

The San Francisco Convention will open Wednesday night, July 7, with six meetings in San Francisco churches and one each in Oakland and Alameda, all having for their subject The Life Filled with the Spirit. Thursday morning's session will be occupied with addresses of welcome and responses, Dr. Clark's annual address and Secretary Baer's report. The denominational rallies will fill the afternoon, and the addresses of the evening will touch on Christian Endeavor's relation to social purity, the saloon, Sabbath observance, political righteousness and good literature. Friday morning's meeting in Woodward's Pavilion will deal with the Christian Endeavorer's part in the Sunday evening and midweek services, closing with a pastors' symposium on that topic. In Mechanics' Pavilion there will be a discussion of Christian Endeavor in the country and in the large cities and the essentials of a C. E. Society. Friday and Monday afternoons are both to be devoted to committee conferences, with a Junior rally Monday afternoon. Christian fellowship will be the topic for Friday evening. Saturday morning will be marked by a new feature, in that the speakers will be State secretaries, State presidents and the trustees of the United Society, and the subjects to be considered will be committee work, Junior and Intermediate Societies and the United Society. This session will be followed by an open air meeting especially for the benefit of San Francisco citizens. In the afternoon there will be an excursion and in the evening the State rallies. On Sunday afternoon separate meetings will be held for men, for women and for ministers and church officers. Evangelistic and missionary work will be the theme for Monday morning, and it is expected that at the closing sessions Monday evening the preachers will be Rev. G. F. Pentecost, D. D., and Rev. F. B. Meyer. Bible study will be held every morning and evangelistic services every noon.

Transportation from New England will be easily and comfortably effected by one of the direct lines to Colorado and Utah, thence via the Southern Pacific. The train will leave Boston Monday or Tuesday, June 28, 29. Sunday will be passed in Salt Lake City. The probable rate, round trip, is $73. This is for transportation; sleepers and meals en route not included. An estimate of the total expenses of attendance, including entertainment in San Francisco one week, but with no side trips, is $130; with palace sleepers and visits to the Yosemite and Monterey, $150. It is expected that between 200 and 300 delegates will go to the convention from Massachusetts. Leaders in California expect 7,500 from outside their State. At the Golden Gate interest in the great gathering is keen. Money is ready and the workers enthusiastic. The business men of the convention city have pledged $25,000 toward the general expenses. Nor has preparation for the Spirit been neglected. The pastors of all the evangelical churches in the State have been appealed to by their San Francisco brethren, requesting co-operation for "the largest fruitfulness of the convention."

EASTER BELLS
By Mrs. SANGSTER.

POEMS. By MARGARET E. SANGSTER. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1.25.

Will find a warm welcome from the thousands of readers who have found comfort and sympathy in Mrs. Sangster's earlier poems. She seeks no ambitious themes, she vexes her muse with no studied and difficult art, but she sings the songs of every day with a quickness of comprehension, a warmth of sympathy, a womanly sunshine and courage and a strong Christian faith, which are not voiced in such full measure by any other poet. It is this which makes her work so widely and lovingly read —Brooklyn Eagle.

Will be a highly appreciated gift book for Easter, or, indeed, for any season. . . . No poet of today is more widely and worthily popular, and none whose words carry more of cheer and comfort to the heart and home . . . Since Whittier we have had no poet who has won so strong a hold upon the love and affection of the people as Mrs Sangster, and this volume will add to her well deserved popularity. —Christian Intelligencer, N. Y.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS

Various are the results of the free pew system, as a comparison of our reports about it at different times would show. Connecticut churches have adopted the plan as largely as those of any State that we know of, and yet we hear occasionally, as this week, from the largest churches that anticipations have not always been realized. The conditions which the system must face determine its success or failure in the greatest degree.

Our city churches should rejoice when there are put forth such energetic efforts as a New England State has felt through its missionary society, since this labor is indirectly for the upbuilding of the city churches themselves, because of the constant exodus of the brightest youth of the rural to the larger centers.

The chief benefit of such an extensive canvass as a city of the White Mountain State has undergone will be to the pastor whose parish work is large, and who lays immediate plans for concentrated efforts which shall be guided by the results of the previous work.

The advocacy of the curfew in a large city of the Bay State voices again the sentiment which has already established the ancient custom as a safeguard for the youth in about 200 other cities and towns of this country.

Doubtless the Iowa congregation which so unexpectedly lifted a debt is as happy as the pastor whose suggestion it followed. An epidemic of such surprise parties would be refreshing.

"How difficult it is to push Congregationalism in this region!" writes a North Carolinian. A strong step in advance, however, has just been taken in a certain district of the State.

Ohio Congregationalism is strong, but it is cheering to see it further strengthened. The evidences of such development come from a small young church and an important old one.

Sixty years in one church choir is a record not often attained by one person. A Massachusetts singer is entitled to the honor due such service.

Churches in the midst of a foreign population will be interested in a new feature by which one in St. Louis strives to win the Germans.

How many of our strong churches square accounts every week with their pastors as does one of less than 150 members in Kansas?

A church in one of the Central States solved the evening service problem satisfactorily and, doubtless, permanently.

PRACTICAL UNION FOR REVIVAL

Conway, Whately, Sunderland and Deerfield are contiguous Massachusetts towns, each with a Congregational church which is the heart of the social and religious life of its community. Early last October these churches planned concerted work for the fall and winter and after spending two afternoons in prayerful consideration they outlined their program of work. The multiplication of cottage and schoolhouse prayer meetings was designed to stimulate prayerfulness and expectancy in every part of the united communities. Then the pastor and a number of brethren from each church visited all the others at the time of the midweek prayer service. The visiting pastor took charge of the service and his associates took a part. Uniform topics were agreed on and the thought and prayers of the entire circle of churches followed on the same line. No part of the plan worked more successfully than this. The churches were never in such close touch as now, and rarely now are prayers offered that mention is not made of the "associated churches."

The church members have come to feel a keener sense of the solidarity of the kingdom, and their interest in one another has shown itself in a practical way. During the last months of the year every two weeks there was present at the midweek prayer service a visiting delegation. The effect was to build up and strengthen that important service.

The final part of the plan was evangelistic meetings for two weeks in each church. Rev. John Jordan of Providence was engaged and he worked with practical good sense. He began in Conway Jan. 19 and closed at Sunderland in March. An additional week or two in some of the churches would have further enlarged the scope of the work. But there were conversions in all the churches and the general feeling favors the plan. Each pastor has a company of converts to train as well as the joy of feeling that the church has been helped to a better life.

A PASTORAL TRANSFER IN THE BAY STATE

The Wellesley church, organized in 1798, and therefore approaching its centennial anniversary, has recently provided for an important space on its program for that event by electing as its leader the pastor of another Massachusetts parish, Rev. Edward H. Chandler, formerly of Union Church, Taunton. Coming from the youngest and yet one of the strongest churches in Taunton, Mr. Chandler now enters an undivided field which contains nearly 200 families, with a church membership of about 300. Furthermore, the educational elements of the town are emphasized in the Sunday morning congregations during term time by the presence of about fifty of the pupils of Dana Hall and a fair number of Wellesley College students.

REV. E H. CHANDLER

A fine equipment for thorough, up-to-date work greets the energy and courage of the new pastorate. The meeting house is commandingly situated on rising ground near the central square and railroad station, and besides its accommodations and those of the chapel a two-story parish house has lately been finished, which affords special advantages for Sunday school uses and social purposes. Within it, besides the classrooms, are a ladies' parlor, large dining hall, kitchen and kindergarten-room. With such surroundings, and supported by an active, well-organized body of workers, the new pastor begins an inspiring and no less hopeful period of work.

Edward Herrick Chandler is a native of New Haven, Ct., where he was born in 1863, the son of Rev. John E. Chandler, who went to India in 1847 and died there three years ago while in the active service of the American Board. The son spent his early years in India, but returning to this country he fitted for college in the Newton schools, and graduated from Yale in 1885 and from Andover Seminary in 1888. Thereafter he spent a year at the seminary in post graduate study of the Old Testament.

He served then as assistant editor for the C. S. S. and P. S. in Boston, and later assisted in editing the Blakeslee courses of Bible study. While in Boston he was connected with Berkeley Temple. Mr. Chandler was lled to the pastorate of Union Church, aunton, in 1892. During his period of work ere he aided in organizing the Ministerial nion of the vicinity, serving as its secretary ree years. He also started the Curtis Club, organization of men for the discussion of blic questions and maintaining a free pub- reading-room.

The present pastorate began the middle of st month, and the installation exercises, aking a particularly interesting service, ere held the evening of April 8. A strong rmon was preached by Rev. G. A. Gordon, .D., and the prayer was offered by Rev. S. Chandler of India, a brother of Mr. handler, while the charge to him was given his brother-in-law, Dr. Munger.

AN EXTENSIVE RALLY FOR MISSIONS

Maine, with its 120 Congregational mission- y churches and fields, has sufficiently varied terests and industries to give a sincere at- mpt at its evangelization a significant char- ter. A month's missionary rally through the ntral and western portions was lately closed the secretary of the State society, in com- any with Rev. C. L. Parker of Ashland and rs. S E. Foster, for ten years a general mis- onary in several large destitute districts.

The experiment was an attempt to present e missionary work of a single New England tate by a series of "field days," the churches a neighborhood uniting for afternoon and vening midweek meetings. The interest own in nearly all the nineteen cities and wns touched by the thousand miles of travel stified the work fully and many churches ere convinced of the needs near at home nd that earnest efforts are in progress for the vangelization of Maine's spiritually-barren istricts.

To realize that the material growing up in ur New England districts is rich in possibili- es if only evangelized, and that it will thus ontribute the choicest element to the life of ur churches and State, is but a single factor the important problem of the town and vil- ge churches.

The rally of the Maine society just finished as emphasized two facts not always suffi- iently counted upon: that everywhere there re some deeply interested in the wider cause f missions; and that up-to-date accounts of hristian work from the lips of men and omen actively and often heroically engaged it meet a quick response when they reach he ears of the people. CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS

N. C.—The Piedmont District Conference met in Whittier April 1–3. The reports from churches and schools were encouraging. The conference ordained E. W. Hollies of the Saluda Seminary. He has been preaching as a licentiate for seven years in connection with his teaching, but desired, although advanced in life, to become an ordained minister. The ordination sermon was preached by Rev. Alpheus Winter. The conference was transformed into the Congregational Association of Western North Carolina, in the hope that the Golden Valley Conference will be absorbed, thus making one stronger organization in the place of two weak ones.

O.—Marietta Conference held its spring meeting two weeks earlier than usual, in order to unite with the meeting of the recognition council in Marietta. There were reports from the churches and a discussion on How to Increase the Usefulness of the Conference. It was decided to employ but one minister for all the missionary churches of the conference.

Ind.—Kokomo Association held its semi-annual meeting in Portland, April 6, 7. Rev. A. H. Ball, D. D., preached the sermon. The topics were: Revivals, Tendency of Modern Biblical Criticism, Supreme Authority of the Scriptures, Christian Citizenship, Civic Duties, Congregational Outlook in Indiana and Extra-Cent-a-Day Plan of Giving. The topics were: The Holy Spirit, The Holy Spirit in the Pastor and in the Church Member, Why Have We not More Conversions in Our Churches? Has the Holy Spirit Lost His Power? Massachusetts

Cambridge.—Wood Memorial recently entered upon its sixth year of using printed topics in the midweek prayer meeting, and laymen as leaders instead of the pastor. The Y. P. S. C. E. has assumed the expense of printing Sunday calendars, thus enabling the church to have them for the first time in its history. At the annual meeting it was decided to continue the services of the church visitor, the expense of whom has heretofore been borne by the Massachusetts H. M. S. Special repairs are to be made on the edifice in preparation for the observance of the 25th anniversary of the church and the 10th of the present pastorate on Oct. 16 next. Rev. I. W. Sneath is pastor.

Chelsea.—First has special meetings for Holy Week on four nights. Last Sunday evening the pastor, Dr. R. C. Houghton, lectured on The City of Jerusalem to an attentive congregation, which was larger than ordinarily. The following evening Miss E. M. Lowell.—The 101st session of the New England Methodist Church, held in this city during the past week, has given pleasant evidence of the fraternal relations between the Methodists and Congregationalists. All the pastors were invited to the bishop's reception; four of them were formally presented to the conference in session; five welcomed Methodist preachers to their pulpits on Sunday.——Six of the churches hold special services during the present week. Several will have the communion service Thursday evening.

Yarmouth.—Rev. J. J. Walker, recently called to this pastorate, was installed April 6. Nine churches were represented in the council. After the examining session and a dinner, the afternoon exercises of installation proceeded. Prof. W. H. Ryder of Andover preached the sermon. Letters read from former pastors were appropriate.

Norwood.—A fine audience of young people, largely of the C. E. Societies from neighboring towns, listened, April 6, to a searching and persuasive address by Rev. Arthur Little, D. D., of Dorchester. A sermon by the pastor, Rev. C. F. Weeden, April 16, will close a series of services made profitable and inspiring by the courtesy and help of prominent preachers.

Marlboro.—William Stetson, Esq., entered the church choir in 1837 and has been a member continuously since that time. He was born in South Boston, but while a boy moved to Marlboro, and began to sing in the choir when he was 13 years old. His father was then the leader, and eventually he succeeded him in that position. The members of the church gave Mr. Stetson a reception last week in celebration of his long term of service.

Worcester.—The ministers at their meeting, March 5, heard a paper by Dr. G. H. Gould on The Secret of Power in the Sermon. The speaker declared, in his usual vigorous style, that for 250 years the intellectual strength of the New England pulpit had given it a supremacy over college, judiciary, legislative hall, social, moral and civic reform and material prosperity as a constructive force in shaping New England and America.——Much satisfaction is felt that the license commissioners have regarded the protest of the young people of the Christian Endeavor Societies and Epworth Leagues against licenses at Lake Quinsigamond. The following Tuesday evening a reception was given in honor of the pastor, and was well attended. Several speeches of congratulation were made, and as a tribute to the long period of service a generous gift of money was presented Dr. Rowland.

Clifford, who has had long experience in such work, has made a religious canvass of the city during 11 weeks, visiting 2,500 families. Ninety-five per cent. of the families expressed church preferences, though not more than one-half could be classed as regular attendants on Sunday services.

Keene.—First has lately been sorely bereaved in the death of Azro B. Skinner, one of its most eminent and useful members. For many years he was deeply interested in the church and society, and for 10 years was superintendent of the Sunday school. His place will not soon be filled.

Exeter.—First. In the late death of Mrs. E. A. Merrill, the church has sustained an irreparable loss. She had long been an untiring worker in seeking to promote its material and spiritual interests, and will still be remembered for the good she has done.

Vermont

Sudbury.—The addition of 14 recently received on confession increases the active membership more than threefold. Others will join later. This is the result of interest awakened by the work of Miss S. A. Chapin, who came here under the auspices of the Rutland County C. E. Union in January, and who since then has been supported by the church. Of late years the church has had only student supplies in the summer.

Central Falls.—Rev. J. H. Lyon enjoyed the rare experience, April 4, of observing his 30th anniversary as pastor. Beautiful floral tokens expressed the congratulations of hosts of friends, besides choice letters from others. Using the same text of his first sermon, Mr. Lyon preached a commemorative discourse. The first meeting house was enlarged once and rebuilt entirely about 12 years ago, costing $40,000. The benevolences have averaged $2,000 yearly. The city's increase of population has not been of the kind which would turn to a Congregational church, but the membership is about double the original. The simplest gospel has been preached in the pulpit and the pastor's long ministry has proved its power.

A variety of opinions were brought out.——Second. Dr. J. C. Davenport preached a sermon a week ago Sunday in commemoration of the organization of the church, which took place 45 years ago. Beginning with 50 members, nine of whom are still connected with the church, its membership has grown to over 1,000. The total who have been received into membership during its existence is 1,830.

Greenfield Hill held its annual parish meeting April 3. The financial condition is excellent. The year closes with $235 balance. The church is about to purchase a new pipe organ and expects to have the whole amount raised by the time the instrument is in the house. New stained glass windows have also been ordered; 12 are given by Mrs. Anna M. Bartram in memory of Rev. John Goodsell, who was the first pastor. The church has welcomed 45 persons into membership the last two years. Rev. J. B. Kettle is pastor.

Watertown.—First. The extensive improvements voted at the special meeting, April 2, include a rearrangement of the pews and aisles, the placing of new doors to the vestibule, removing the pillars that support the galleries, a basement large enough to hold two hot air furnaces, and general repairing and painting. Willimantic.—The annual meeting of the society showed the expenses for the year had been $3,973, which the receipts, with about $500 due on pew rentals, will about cover. It was voted to sell the pews the coming year as usual. A collection of over $50 was taken up a week ago Sunday morning for home missions.

Ridgefield.—Encouraging reports were read at the annual meeting a week ago Monday. The pastor, Rev. J. W. Ballantine, in behalf of the church members, presented B. K. Northrop, Esq., with a handsome oak secretary and chair for his faithful service as clerk of the church the past 43 years.

MARIETTA.—The services in recognition of Rev. . R. Nichols as pastor, March 30, were participated n by all the churches of the conference. A unique eature was the pledging of the pastor and congreation to their mutual relation by rising in reponse to the request of the moderator. It is a natter of interest to Ohio Congregationalism that his old, strong and strategic church is again so bly manned. Besides the usual exercises there vere addresses by Rev. J. G. Frazer on Our Work Beyond the Parish and Rev. W. F. McMillen on The Church and the Young. Mr. Nichols spent a ear in the study of law in New York city, after raduating from Oberlin in 1879. Later he entered)berlin Seminary, graduating in 1883. He was pasor in Garrettsville, O., and then Dr. Schauffler's ssistant at Bethlehem Church in Cleveland, until e went to Medina. He has served several years on he executive committee of the Ohio H. M. S.

CLEVELAND.—Prof. G. F. Wright of Oberlin reiewed Dr. Lyman Abbott's Theology of an Evoluionist before the ministers at their April meeting.)r. William Hayes Ward of the Independent also poke. The latter spent a week in the city giving a ourse of five lectures on The Bible and Bible ands. The lectures were given upon the "Flornce Harkness Foundation," under the auspices of delbert College, and were heard with great interst by audiences that crowded the lecture-room. The interest in Bible study which is so general hroughout the country has not been lacking in Cleveland. For the past two years a wealthy voman has met the expense of extended courses of ectures under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A, emiient speakers being brought from various cities.

SPRINGFIELD.—First. Rev. E. A. Steiner has just losed his first year with this church. A large auience listened to the fourth and last lecture on Foreshadowings of Christ in the Old Testament. For the first time in many years the evening congregations have been larger regularly than those of he morning. This result has been reached by the lain, earnest preaching of the gospel. A number of persons have been added to the church during he year, and there has been a marked growth in piritual power.——Lagonda Avenue. The wife of he pastor, Rev. A. E. Woodruff, has formed an organization of the primary Sunday school teachers of the city, which will hold meetings every Sunday fternoon. She has been chosen president.

SOMERDALE, in central Ohio, came into existence a few years ago spontaneously. Rev. F. W. Keagy, who has recently left the M. E. Church for the Congregational, became acting pastor last fall. As a result of revival meetings in January the membership was increased from 25 to 100. Secretaries Frazer and McMillen spent March 27, 28, with this church, holding six services, receiving 13 young persons into the church and baptizing 14 babies.

SAYBROOK made their annual offering to the American Board March 28, amounting to $31, the largest of its offerings for that work during the present pastorate of about six years. The pastor, Rev. C. W. Grupe, preached on The Missionary Spirit of Christianity the preceding Sunday and sent to each family the pastoral letter furnished free by the board; an envelope for each member of every family was inclosed.

FREDERICKSBURG has received a great blessing through meetings held by Evangelist A. T. Reed. The church was without a pastor and somewhat disheartened. The meetings, besides adding 20 new members, so stimulated zeal and courage that a pastor will be called.

Illinois

EVANSTON.—First made an offering for the C. C. B. S. for a memorial chapel in memory of the late Rev. V. E. Loba, Noble, Mo. Mr. Loba was the brother of the pastor here, Dr. J. B. Loba. Before the collection was made a letter was read by Major Reddington describing the needs of the field and asking for $300, which were subscribed.

PAYSON.—First. Rev. William Huelster, who enters upon the pastorate, leaves a regretful people in the Presbyterian church of Ontario, Cal, where his work was highly fruitful, 64 new members being received during his short pastorate, 25 on confession.

Indiana

INDIANAPOLIS.—Plymouth. The McCulloch Club celebrated its first anniversary April 4, with a beautiful evening service. Sixty young men are members. A letter and a poem of Mr. Richard Watson Gilder, who has taken an interest in the club, were read. The club succeeds in drawing large congregations. The Saturday lectures on Patriotism have taxed the capacity of the building, and the attendance of young men upon all the services of the church has been greatly increased.——Brightwood, which has recently been rebuilt and enlarged, has been opened for services and a series of meetings is being held by the pastor, Rev. C. E. Grove. The church will be rededicated soon.

CEDARWOOD.—Rev. E. W. Murray, who supplies this point in connection with Central and Beachwood, has closed the meetings; 10 united with the church, eight on confession and others will follow. The people of this southernmost county in which Congregationalism has entered in Indiana are responding to the gospel and receive the life and polity of the denomination with favor. Two other neighboring points are inviting.

FORT WAYNE.—Plymouth is making a heroic effort to raise its mortgage of $12,000. The edifice was erected in 1893 at a cost of $30,000. The church is doing splendid work. Rev. J. S. Ainslie is the efficient pastor.

ELWOOD, organized two years ago, has a membership of 36 and a Sunday school of 130. It raises $456 toward the pastor's salary. Services are held in both Welsh and English.

Michigan

DETROIT.—Mt. Hope. The Men's Auxiliary took charge of a recent Sunday evening service. A choir of 18 male voices furnished music and different men took the various parts of the service, including three short addresses.——The regular monthly meeting of the pastors of the city and vicinity was held April 5. Various topics of interest were discussed.——People's. Rev. F. A. Miller is conducting a two weeks' mission.——Brewster. Rev. McH. Wallace has just commenced his fourth year of work. The church has about 250 members, and a large Sunday school and Y. P. S. C. E. The congregations have outgrown the accommodations, and a new auditorium is necessary.

GRAND RAPIDS.—Plymouth held a Sunday school rally. The central thought of the program was "home" and every part was in harmony with that thought, and Dr. James Gallup's sermon on the occasion was on The Home, in which he drew pictures of different kinds of homes with their influences and consequent results.

GREENVILLE is saddened by the thought of having to part with its esteemed pastor, Rev. A. M. Hyde, who accepts the call from Fall River, Mass. He will carry with him the benedictions of a loyal and loving people.

RED JACKET.—Evangelistic meetings have been held, in which the pastor has been aided by other clergymen. The services were helpful to all, and accessions resulted.

NEWAYGO is vigorously clearing off a long standing debt under the active leadership of Rev. C. H. Daines.

Wisconsin

SPARTA.—As a result of a series of revival meetings, assisted by Evangelist A. M. Hills, 96 persons were received into the church April 4, all but seven on confession; five others were propounded and others will come. The membership of the church now numbers 502, 80 being non-resident. The pastor, Rev. William Crawford, highly commends the work of the evangelist.

MENOMONIE.—Rev. J. W. White, with the assistance of Rev. H. R. Vaughn of Wheaton, has developed a new field four miles south of this place. After further work by the district missionary, Rev. R. L. Cheney, a church is likely to result.

SPRING VALLEY has been greatly encouraged by a refreshing revival, resulting in about 30 professed converts and a hope of many more. Rev. F. B. Bridgman is pastor.

NEW LONDON.—The gospel meetings led by Evangelist C. N. Hunt closed April 4. Christians have been quickened and hundreds of cards have been signed.

PESHTIGO.—The Ladies' Aid Society netted $40 from a recent entertainment. A successful C. E. Society has just been started by the pastor, Rev. E. N. Andrews.

THE WEST

Missouri

ST. LOUIS.—Immanuel, in addition to the usual Sunday sessions, has provided an afternoon preaching service in German with good prospect of success.——First holds special services each evening of Holy Week, to close with communion Easter morning.——Union recently gave a reception to its new pastor, Rev. S. T. McKinney.

KANSAS CITY.—Olivet dedicated a new edifice March 28, including land, at a cost of $12,000, all of which is paid except a loan of $2,000 from the C. C. B. S. Addresses were made by Drs. Wolcott Calkins and Henry Hopkins, Rev. J. H. Crum and Supt. A. K. Wray.

Iowa

SPENCER observed recently the 25th anniversary of its organization. Various historical papers were read, and there were addresses by Dr. Ephraim Adams, who, as H. M. superintendent, helped to organize the church, and by Rev. J. M. Cumings, its second pastor. Letters were read from the venerable Father W. L. Coleman, the organizer and first pastor, and from Rev. G. G. Perkins, the third pastor. During the past six years the church has enjoyed great prosperity under the care of Rev. J. O. Thrush. It has now a fine house of worship, a comfortable parsonage, a large and growing congregation and a membership of about 150.

HUMBOLDT.—Beginning with the Week of Prayer, revival services, in which Congregationalists, Baptists and Methodists united, continued for three months with unabated interest. Rev. R. L. Marsh, of the Congregational church, and Mr. Beatty, the Methodist pastor, have had charge of the work. Evangelist W. H. Smith of Clinton assisted during the two weeks beginning Feb. 7, and Rev. C. N. Severance the week preceding March 28, when the meetings closed. Accessions have been received at various times during the meetings, and large ingatherings were expected at the April communion.

Doon.—Within two months 38 persons have united, all but five on confession. All but two were adults, 30 were heads of families and 20 were men. Evangelist Hartsough has been assisting the pastor, Rev. W. L. Brandt.

Bear Grove and Elliott are now yoked under the care of Rev. B. F. Myers, who will reside at Lewis, midway between the two fields. This arrangement is made in part to help lighten the burden of the C. H. M. S.

Manson.—About 60 hopeful conversions, including several prominent business men, are reported as resulting from special meetings conducted by Rev. F. G. Wilcox assisted by Rev. C. P. Boardman of Webster City.

Correctionville has held meetings with the Methodists, which resulted in great good to both churches. As the first fruits 14 members have been received by the Congregationalists on confession. Rev. J. B. Chase is pastor.

Marshalltown.—On a recent Sunday Rev. C. R. Gale surprised his people by asking them to remove a debt of $700, and they surprised themselves by doing it.

Magnolia.—Union revival meetings were held for seven weeks, adding 13 members to the Congregational church. Various improvements on the parsonage property are reported. Rev. P. B. West is pastor.

Hampton.—Following union revival services was an ingathering of 50 persons into the Congregational church, 41 on confession. Evangelist Cordner conducted the meetings. Rev. J. W. Ferner is pastor.

Rowen, since Jan. 1, has received 24 accessions. The building of a barn has increased the value of the parsonage property by about $150.

The forthcoming Year-Book will report from Iowa 322 churches with a membership of 34,694. The total accessions were 4,964, of which 3,358 were on confession; 2,510 removals left a net gain in membership of 2,241. The total benevolences were $57,874, an increase of $1,489.

Minnesota

Owatonna.—The C. E. Society has started a State convention fund, and at the same time created a social atmosphere for the prayer meeting by serving tea before the mid-week service on two occasions. In the absence of a rector at St. Paul's, the Congregational pastor, Rev. J. H. Chandler, was called upon to conduct a funeral service in that church. At the morning service March 28 about $300 were raised for repairing and reseating the main auditorium, and a committee is at work to secure about $400 more.

Excelsior has been greatly strengthened during the pastorate of Rev. C. L. Mears, and has received a number of members. Money has been raised for renovating the house of worship, the young people taking the lead. The pastor recently spent a Sunday with his former charges at Springfield and Selma, and much interest developed.

Hibbing.—The C. H. M. S. began work here over a year ago, but was unfortunate in the missionary sent, who nearly ruined the enterprise. Work has been resumed, a church of nine members organized, a pastor secured, and preparations are being made for building. This is a new mining town in the heart of the iron region.

Staples.—Evangelist Burwick has been helping in a series of meetings, which have resulted in much spiritual uplift. Plans are being made to receive several new members at Easter, and an effort will also be made to relieve the church from debt, in which Supt. J. H. Morley will assist.

Park Rapids.—The year's work of Rev. Esther Smith has been greatly blessed. Eleven new members have been received, nine on confession, and the congregations have increased. Prayer meetings are largely attended and the church is greatly revived from the low state of a year ago.

Faribault.—The pastor, Rev. G. S. Ricker, is working hard among the southern Minnesota churches in behalf of the A. M. A. debt. In place of the evening service the church has voted to try the experiment of a vesper service at five o'clock, followed by the C. E. meeting.

Mapleton.—Evangelistic services have been held here, the Congregational, Free Baptist and Methodist churches uniting. About 70 persons have expressed a purpose to begin the Christian life, and the community has been greatly benefited.

Lake Park.—During the one year's ministry of Rev. E. C. Chevis a parsonage has been secured and

Deaths

HARWOOD—In Orleans, Mch. 22 (not Mch. 30), Rev. Chas. E. Harwood, pastor at Cranberry Isles, Me., aged 55 yrs.

LACEY—In Bridgeport, Ct., Mch. 31, Rowland B. Lacey, aged 79 yrs., deacon of First (North) Congregational Church for nearly fifty years.

SHARP—In Dorchester, April 10, Deacon James C. Sharp, 79 years, prominent for many years in the Second Congregational Church.

STEDMAN—In Northampton, April 9, Rebecca Napier, widow of W. S. Stedman, aged 71 yrs., a devoted and warmly esteemed member of the Edwards Church.

DEACON LYMAN SABIN

In the death of Deacon Lyman Sabin on Sunday, March 28, in his eighty-fourth year, the Congregational church in Belchertown loses one of its strongest supporters and the community one of its most respected citizens. He was a native and life-long resident of the town, a communicant in the church since 1835 and a deacon since 1863, though of late not in active service. He was a man of profound religious convictions. He revered God, loved righteousness, deeply felt the evil and demerit of sin, longed, labored and prayed for the triumph of God's kingdom, and felt the utmost confidence in the efficacy of the gospel.

His farmhouse, which overlooked an extensive sweep of country to westward, was the center of a loving home life and of a gracious hospitality. Here his father, Thomas Sabin, died in 1885 in his 102d year. This was the early home of his brother, the late Rev. Dr. Lewis Sabin of Templeton, well known to former Amherst students as a trustee. Prof. William L. Montague, until recently of the Amherst faculty, was his sister's son. His daughter, Mrs. Maria Sabin Longley, has wide acquaintance as a Mt. Holyoke graduate and a teacher. Besides he leaves two other daughters, Laura S. and Mrs. Lewis K. Williams of Kent, O., and a widow, a descendant of one of the earliest Connecticut Valley families. P. W. L.

The church at North Middleboro, Mass., has experienced great loss in the death of two earnest, devoted, ideal deacons. Solomon White died Feb. 15, 1895, aged seventy-five. As a business man, Sunday school superintendent, teacher, treasurer and deacon, he was efficient in every detail. As benefactor of the needy, generous in every good work, interested in the young, watchful for the wayward, every one loved him, and he is still greatly missed.

Elijah Eaton Perkins on Dec. 13, 1896, passed to the home above. Of his ninety-two years, sixty-five have been in the membership of the church, and forty-six in the diaconate. Successful in business, a pioneer shoe manufacturer, he consecrated all to God. The church, which he endowed and the cause of missions have lost a champion. Earnest for souls, wise in counsel, approachable, humble in spirit, he, too, was beloved and honored. These are rare men. May a double portion of their spirit be upon us. H. K. J.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK

There is no notable change in general trade. Business is only moderate in volume and prices show improvement only in spots. In some staple lines there is considerable activity, but in no direction, except perhaps in wool, does it meet expectation or desire. The floods in the Mississippi and Missouri River valleys have caused almost complete stagnation in those sections and the severe rainstorms have rendered Western roads almost impassable, to the detriment of the movement of merchandise.

Iron and steel products continue depressed both in price and demand; it is the general opinion that the demand is even less than it has been. An ore pool was recently formed and this is expected ultimately to help the situation. Last week the price of wheat broke sharply on the report of an increase in the world's visible supply. Domestic stocks of wheat were 37 per cent. smaller than one year ago, and 40 per cent. smaller than two years ago.

In cotton goods there is a little better movement, although the prices received do not admit of much profit to the mills. Still, mill treasurers are encouraged at the fact that the goods can be moved at all. Woolens are quite active. A large commission house says that it has sold all it cares to with the wool market in its present lively condition. Novelty dress goods in woolens for fall wear have been in considerable demand, and the mills are turning out many pretty effects in this direction.

The stock market continues apathetic, only relieved at intervals by the bears advancing prices on themselves, when they then try to cover their "short" contracts. Railroad earnings for March for the first time since July, 1896, show an increase in the gross. The tariff discussion keeps Wall Street on the qui vive, especially in regard to Sugar Trust stock, which is expected to decline, although up to the present it has remained fairly steady.

DON'T WORRY ABOUT THE BIBLE

Dr. S. E. Herrick, of Mount Vernon Church, Boston, recently preached an excellent sermon on Ps. 37: 7." Among other disturbing things which at this time cause anxiety to God's children, he mentioned the modern investigations into the history and structure of the Bible, and spoke as follows:

A good many people are worried and distressed nowadays on account of dangers which seem to be threatening the Bible. If we do really believe it to be a series of writings through which God has revealed himself to the world, are such fears creditable to our faith? If it is pre-eminently God's book—a structure which he who created the world and who has begotten human souls has built up through the ages for the instruction and salvation of these souls—is it any way likely that he will allow it to be disintegrated and vanish away until it has accomplished the end for which he designed it? If the Bible is an institution of God it will stay till its work is done. It hurts nothing that God has made to have questions asked about it. He sets his works—all of them—over against the prying, inquisitive, investigating minds of his children to provoke their interest, to draw out their powers of judgment, to lead them into discovery, to induce them to search out his methods and to think his thoughts after him. Why fret while such a process is going on? It will be a long time before men discover exactly how the Bible was constructed. They have only just found out that it did not drop down from heaven a completed and finished thing. Let me give you a parable.

A Father built a house for his young and growing family. It was ample and covered a great deal of ground. It was high and had a broad outlook. There were cheerful rooms, with warm firesides, where they could gather in security from the storms, broad, sunny piazzas where they could live half out of doors. There were chambers of peace where they could spend the nights with none to make them afraid, galleries hung with pictures of historic events, portraits of ideal characters, scenes of imagination and fancy. There were halls tapestried with the lives of kings and the battles they fought. There were studies where the children could be summoned to instruction through the media of history, poetry, romance, allegory, fable and proverb. By and by, after the house was measurably complete, though with an unfinished wing running out here and there, and the children had been living in it for some time, they woke up to discover that their Father did not build or finish the house at all in the way they had thought. He had been a very long time building it. Moreover, he did not himself, with his own hands, saw a plank or lay a stone or drive a nail. He had employed some of his older children in the work—who had now grown up and gone to live elsewhere in the estate. He let them bring the materials together from widely separated lands. Half a dozen of the older boys had worked in succession upon one corner of the foundation. Two of them had built one room. One of them was named Isaiah, the name of the other had been forgotten, but you could see where their work joined.

The music-room, which answered also for a chapel, was one of the most wonderful rooms in the house. It was constructed of beautiful woods and precious stones of a great variety of grain and polish, and was wonderfully harmonious. Into some of the chambers the workmen had brought beautiful pieces and fragments of fancifully wrought stone, whose origin they did not, or could not, tell. There were quaint gargoyles, and humorous and grotesque monsters that had an Oriental look. But so lovingly had these older children wrought—so in the spirit of the Father's will and purpose—that the whole house spoke of him. Through all the long process his thought had been going into it, and, while the actual workmen were thinking only of the logs they were sawing or of the stones they were laying at the moment, he was keeping the whole in mind, and when it was complete it everywhere spoke of his glory.

But when the growing children began to make their discoveries of which I have spoken, to find out that some of the pictures on the walls were real and some ideal, to investigate and query whether some parts which had once been considered ancient were not more modern, and whether some of the work had not been attributed to builders who really had nothing to do with it, and whether one worker, or two, or half a dozen had been employed in this chamber or that, and whether some things which had long been thought of as essential parts of the edifice were not accretions, such as stones or timbers that had been laid against the walls, or mud which had been thrown at them and hardened through the years, then a good many of the children began to fret and worry lest the Father's house would be pulled down or lest the Father would not get the credit of having built it, or lest the Father's own existence, even, should be endangered or his government should come to an end in his own household.

Why, dear brethren, what does this mean? Let the grand old structure be examined, searched, questioned and cross-questioned, " from turret to foundation stone," and let it answer for itself. It needs no loud outcry, no petulant and fuming protestations on our part. If God Almighty is in his world at all he has certainly had a hand in this marvelous product of the millenniums, and what he wants of it to abide will abide, and you and I ought to want no more.

the work greatly strengthened. The church asks him to remain another year.

Dawson.—Rev. S. R. Brush has been obliged to resign on account of ill health, but a new pastor has already been secured, and the church is united and enthusiastic.

Kansas

Atwood has prospered under the devoted and efficient service of its pastor, Rev. J. J. A. T. Dixon, even when ill-health has prevented him from preaching regularly. Sorrow in the death of Mrs. Dixon has brought pastor and people into still closer fellowship. The church meets a large want in the town and county.

Wichita.—Plymouth has now 172 members, one or more having been received at every communion but one since the arrival of Rev. Messrs. Gould and Ward as co-pastors in 1894. The annual benevolences have increased from $505 to $1,561, and the church is gaining constantly as a recognized spiritual force in the city.

Argentine.—Under the leadership of Rev. C. E. Cushman, who has accepted a call to Russell, the church has been spiritually strengthened, has been freed from a threatening and burdensome debt, and a thriving mission school with regular preaching services has been established in West Argentine.

Westmoreland.—Rev. T. V. Davies of Salina spent a month recently with this former charge, preaching and giving instruction in music. This vacation service was greatly appreciated, and it also has prepared the way for the work of a permanent pastor.

Chapman is progressive and a center of wide usefulness. Led by Rev. W. C. Wheeler, it always works for union among the Christian forces of the town, and for three successive years the three local churches have united in revival meetings.

Kansas City.—Pilgrim. The recent union revival meetings have increased both the membership and spiritual strength, and on a single Sunday $900 toward $1,140 desired for current expenses for the coming year were subscribed.

Altoona.—Rev. I. D. Barnard recently resigned the pastorate and went to Wisconsin to reside near relatives. The church will maintain its work for a time without a pastor.

Great Bend reports loyalty and unity of members, increasing congregations, a regular S. S. attendance of nearly 150 and the pastor paid in full every Monday morning.

Arkansas City, with 110 members, raised $2,000 for all purposes during its last fiscal year, and is out of debt except to the C. C. B. S.

Nebraska

Fremont.—A rousing meeting was held April 5 to devise means by which to persuade the pastor, Rev. W. H. Buss, to remain on the field. Resolutions were adopted expressing entire loyalty and pledging more faithful co-operation if he will yield.

Cambridge.—The pastor, Rev. John Foster, has been diligently following up the results of special meetings and 25 persons united at the April communion. Of these 16 were baptized, and a number who prefer baptism by immersion will unite soon.

Dustin.—The pastor, Mr. J. M. Kokjer, beside caring for the work here and at Richmond, is laboring to revive the almost extinct church of Sonnyview, seven miles from Richmond. The churches cover a field reached by no other denomination.

Ainsworth.—The pastor's training class to prepare boys and girls for church membership now numbers 25. The ages range from five to 14, the average being 10.

The $100 due May 1 from Butler Avenue Church, Lincoln, to the C. C. B. S. has been pledged and will be promptly paid.

North Dakota

Niagara.—The special meetings in charge of Evangelist McQuarrie have closed. Over 30 persons expressed a purpose to enter upon the Christian life, and 25 were received April 4 into fellowship, 22 upon confession.

Oberon.—A new 750 pound bell has recently been purchased. The parish library, established last September through the efforts of Rev. O. P. Champlin, now numbers 143 volumes.

Through the untiring efforts of Rev. G. S. Bascom of Hankinson, and his wife, some troublesome debts have been paid.——Special meetings held recently at Wimbledon have proved helpful. The pastor has moved into the new parsonage.

OTHER CHRISTIAN WORK

The Y. M. C. A. of Montpelier, Vt., opened its new rooms April 9. In the evening Rev. J. L. Hill, D. D., of Salem gave an address.

While Mr. Moody has been rendering good service in New York, Boston and Cincinnati, the training school in Northfield, Mass., of which he is founder and president, has been doing in a quiet way a work nearly as far-reaching, since it numbers among its students young women from Maine to Maryland and from Bulgaria. This school closed its seventh year of work April 1, and the thoughtful papers by the young ladies and the exhibition of work done by various classes showed that the Bible teaching had been sound and such as fits them for active service. Their instruction in cooking, sewing, drawing, physical culture and the principles of nursing was thorough and practical, and the visitor could not fail to be impressed with the fact that Mr. Moody's idea of having Christian workers fitted for every good work is the right one. James M. Gray, D. D., of Boston, spoke to the students, founding his address upon the picture of Christ given in the words, "The Lord God hath given me the tongue of the learned, that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary."

MORTGAGES.

Upon the death of her husband a certain good woman found herself possessed of many apparently worthless Western mortgages. By advice of her local counsel she sold $3,000 of them (par value) for $25. That was before she knew us. Later we disposed of an equal amount of like character for $1,400 cash.

SUNDAY SCHOOL NOTES

Worcester-Franklin is the name taken by the reorganization of Athol and East Franklin Districts.

Twenty States report 135 primary unions, Pennsylvania leading with 23, and Massachusetts having 21.

The Maryland Penitentiary annual report for 1896 shows that out of 768 prisoners over 86 per cent. had at some time attended Sunday school.

Concord District, comprising 10 towns, held its annual meeting, March 23, in South Acton. The delegations represented every town but one.

Miss F. L. Wheeler has been appointed State primary superintendent of Connecticut, and the headquarters have been removed to New Haven.

S. S. evangelistic work is being discussed at many conventions. The impression is growing that the school is the place to convert as well as to instruct.

Southern Essex District met for its first quarterly rally at East Saugus, March 25. The Teacher of the Past and of the Present and The Teacher as a Shepherd were topics.

Indiana claims about 60 per cent. of its S. S. enrollment as being children; Kentucky claims 75 per cent. Only 30 per cent. of the white population of school age in the latter State are in the Sunday schools.

The headquarters of the International Primary Teachers' Union is removed from Boston to Philadelphia. The union has issued a Primary Workers' Manual, containing many valuable suggestions. Address Israel P. Block, 2,006 Park Avenue, Philadelphia, for copies at five cents each.

CHRISTIANITY AND EVOLUTION

Dr. Washington Gladden recently preached a sermon to his congregation defending Dr. Lyman Abbott's views of the Bible and of evolution. Concerning the latter he said:

> It may be that the evolutionists are not fully agreed, but the fact that the universe is the outcome of an evolutionary process is not doubted by scholars of eminence in the world today. What are Christian men going to do with this doctrine? Are they going to set themselves in array against it? Are they going to proclaim that Christianity cannot be reconciled with it? Evolution interprets the universe. It offers an explanation of all things that exist, which satisfies the human mind. Are we going to say that the Christian religion cannot be reconciled with this explanation? . . . Are Christian men by their profession doomed to hold a theory of the universe which contradicts the whole body of modern knowledge? Only yesterday there was laid on my table the last number of the Bibliotheca Sacra, the theological quarterly published at Oberlin and representing the most conservative theological opinion, in which I find a testimony to "the all but universal acceptance of the doctrine of evolution at the present day, not only among men of science, but among liberal-minded theologians and men of cultivation generally." If anything like this is true, is it not time that Christian thinkers were seeking to know whether the truths of their religion can be stated in terms which do not conflict with the evolutionary theory?

Artistic Originality in Dress

THE correct construction of a costume according to one's own ideas can best be accomplished at home by one's self. The most convenient stitching mechanism for the purpose is the Singer Automatic, making the single-thread chain-stitch. Its simplicity of parts, easy operation, and the excellence of its work, specially commend its use to the dilettante dressmaker desiring to express her artistic perceptions in the most appropriate form.

Having all the advantages claimed for other "automatic" sewing-machines, the Silent Singer has many points of preference that can easily be demonstrated by comparison. Of faultless construction and finish, it is absolutely the lightest-running, the simplest and most compact. It is more easily threaded, and its parts are better protected from dust. The broad treadle better of the operator, because it is lower and the position of the feet can be changed at will. These points are worthy careful consideration by those of delicate health or unaccustomed to continuous use of a sewing machine.

THE WISE EVANGELIST

The best type of evangelism must understand, whether it accepts or not, the trend of scholarship within the church; it must be able to appreciate, whether it adopts or not, the methods by which the church maintains its constant and beneficent work in the world, and never underestimate these or give way to a shallow pessimism or cheap and harmful criticism based on imperfect induction; it must believe in the sincerity and efficiency of the men who year in and year out bear the great burdens of pulpit and parish work and whose knowledge of the Bible is usually certainly not inferior to that of the evangelist; it must exercise great care not to take as a dark background, against which to paint its own work in bright colors, the noble and thorough work which makes theirs possible; it should supplement and not overthrow the regular and infinitely more important work of the churches. Then shall revivals be, not as a prairie fire, sweeping all before them and leaving a barren waste behind, but as the rain after dew and shower, drenching the life of the church to its roots.—Rev. W. E. Barton, D.D.

THE FLAG SHOULD PROTECT THE MISSIONARIES

Time was when our country was forward to care not merely for the interests of native born citizens, but also for those who were looking towards these shores of freedom with a view to safer and happier lives. Time was, when our nation was little and our ships were wooden, though the men who sailed them were iron, when Captain Ingraham, in the Turkish harbor of Smyrna, took from an Austrian brig of war a Hungarian refugee, not because he had completed his American citizenship, but only because he had declared his intention of doing so. Captain Ingraham was decorated by this nation with a medal, and by a joint resolution his name was enrolled on the seamen's roll of honor. And this is not jingoism, this is not national vanity or bluster; this is simply asking for the reasonable care which we exert towards our citizens as individuals, which other nations exert towards their citizens. Think of the virtues and attainments of those distinguished Americans who have been willing to be called simply missionaries: legislators, statesmen, promoters of law, order, humanity, civilization and religion, asking nothing for themselves but service. May God help us to lift up and hold up over them the flag of our country.—Rev. Willard Scott, D. D.

WHAT WILL THE IGNORANT MASSES DO

The ignorant masses of Mr. Lecky's formula will not rule through their ignorance. They will rule through their deference to great humbugs, great scoundrels, great priests, or great men. At present they rule through their deference to the great humbugs and the great scoundrels, and so lend support to Mr. Lecky's belief that democracy is the rule of ignorance, and afford apparent justification of Mr. Carlyle's definition of the people as a certain number of millions, mostly fools. If it could be shown that the "boss" is a creation of political democracy, the outlook would indeed be dark. But there are many reasons for believing that popular thought on this question inverts the order of cause and effect. The "boss" is probably not the product of democracy. The misdeeds and follies of democracy are probably due to the independent existence of the "boss." The "boss" flourishes and reigns because men have for the time being lost their faith in the true aristocracy of intellect and conscience. Only to the faint-hearted and to the short sighted should there be any need to say that a determined effort to restore that faith is to be the most momentous sociological phenomenon of the next fifty years. The initiative may be taken by the Roman Catholic Church. Accepting democracy as the inevitable form of the state within the constitution, the Roman Catholic Church fully and deliberately intends to make itself again what once it was—the ruling aristocracy of the state behind the constitution. If this purpose becomes more and more obvious the forces of Protestantism will again be roused to intense activity. The principles of liberty and of individual responsibility will again be opposed to the principle of authority, and will again fascinate the minds of rationalistic men.

In all probability, therefore, the destiny of democracy is to be controlled either by religious authority or by a much more earnest and thoughtful type of Protestant liberalism than that which prevails today. In a struggle between these forces men of all ranks and conditions, the rich and the poor, the learned and the unlearned, will give their allegiance to worthy leaders. The "boss," with his deeds of ignorance and of evil, will sink into oblivion. It should be needless to add that such a struggle, if it comes, will be a contest of ideas."—Prof. F. H. Giddings of Columbia University

Do you know what an "emulsion is?" It is when each drop of the oil is broken up into minute drops, so small you can hardly see them with the microscope: so minute that they pass at once through the tissues into the circulation. Scott's Emulsion does not disturb digestion, is not unpleasant to take, and does not fail to do its work because digestion can deal with it at once. You may be able to disguise the taste of raw oil and get it past the palate. You can't cheat your stomach with it. SCOTT & BOWNE, Chemists, New York.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN

Topic, April 25–May 1. What Is True Liberty and How Is It Won? John 8: 30–40.

Jesus had a hard struggle with the Jews to get them to understand what freedom really is, and we are all likely to be misled by the glamour of false notions. We think that when we attain our majority and can go and come as we please, subject to no dictation from our parents, that when we can go to college and turn the key in the lock on the door through which no one has a right to pass without our permission, we shall be perfectly free. Hundreds of slaves whose shackles Abraham Lincoln's pen broke had to learn by a sad experience that the possession of their own bodies and responsibility for their own behavior did not bring all the joys which they had associated with the idea of freedom. Cuba is groaning for deliverance from the cruel Spaniard, but the question which her best friends ask, which must always arise when a country aspires to independence, is, Is she capable of self-government? Our noisy celebrations of Fourth of July ought not to blind us to the fact that this nation will never be actually free until it is delivered from the domination of selfish and dangerous forces which threaten its very existence.

We see, then, that Christian liberty carries with it the idea of self-mastery, or a certain restraint arising, not from external pressure, but from internal compulsion. I like Robertson's definition of Christian liberty. "It is," says he, "right will sustained by love and made firm by faith in Christ. One whom Christ liberates is free by his own will. It is not that he would and cannot, but that he can and will not." Christ honors us by leaving to our own decision questions touching this or that indulgence or procedure. He lays down no "Thou shalt not" respecting our amusements and pleasures, but the moment we begin to exercise our Christian liberty, just for the sake of proving how free we are, is the moment of danger. We must wheel about our desires and our tastes until they conform to the great pattern which he sets us. We must constantly weigh the dominant purpose of our lives by the central purpose of his.

Paul had the right idea when he conceived of Christian discipleship as a new and blessed kind of slavery. He looked upon himself as delivered over to Jesus Christ, as captives were made over to their Roman conquerors. The only freedom he wanted was the freedom to go wherever Christ wanted him to and to do whatever Christ desired done. A devotion like this easily settles the question as to what one shall eat and what one shall drink, as to wherewithal he shall be amused, and as to how he shall spend his leisure hours.

JUSTICE BREWER'S SUGGESTIONS TO YOUNG MINISTERS

Among the special lectures before the Yale Divinity School this year are two from a layman's point of view. The first was delivered in Marquand Chapel, April 2, by Hon. D. J. Brewer, LL. D., justice of the Supreme Court. The other will be given by Hon. E. J. Phelps, LL. D.

Justice Brewer's lecture was earnest, reverent, and yet tinged with a humor which added to its force. "For fifty years," he said, "I have sat in the pew as a target, every ill I have done, or thought of doing, or that anybody ever thought I had done, has been held up before me. I have had to listen in silence without the luxury of talking back. Now I have you here before me and all is reversed."

"We hear much today," he went on to say, "about the decay of the pulpit. Time was, it is said, when the pulpit attracted young men of brains and power. Today the other professions attract such young men and the second and third class are becoming preachers. In times past the pulpit had undisputed sway, now its right is contested by the editor and the lawyer. It is true that the minister is not bowed down to as a minister. There is no longer a halo around his head. Today he is judged by what he is and by what he does. But this does not indicate the waning value nor the end of the preacher's power. Rather it means more usefulness."

The range of human thought is vaster and the spread of knowledge among the masses is greater than ever before, and the great law today is that of specialization. This affects the minister. He must stay within his special vocation. He must not interfere in business, in education, in legislation with ministerial authority. If he is to have power he can only have it by staying in the pulpit.

There is a growing intensity in democratic thought. The one sacred thing is the individual. No dominance attaches to the accidents and incidents of life. Only manhood counts. There is no divine right of kings, no apostolic succession, no inherited greatness. To say, "I am a minister," does not inspire fear and humility. Blowing rams' horns may have caused the walls of Jericho to fall, but it will not break down the walls around men today.

Justice Brewer offered a few direct suggestions: First, as to business relations. Be independent. Let us have no more half-fare tickets, donation parties and "discounts to the clergy." The minister should not have money "given" him. He should be paid. He should be an equal laborer with other laborers and with equal rights.

Second. Do not trust the Lord too much. Do not exempt yourselves from the ordinary laws of business. Special providences seldom come to those who try to trade in them. It does not add to the minister's power to have unpaid bills against him. The fault is not always the minister's. But it always comes in part from his failure to insist on business methods.

Thirdly. Do not write your sermons. Talk to the people. If you want to write reach the people through the papers. Imitate the lawyer here. Be an advocate.

Fourth. Do not preach too much theology. Preach some. Theology is not out of date. Still there is no time for unimportant matters. Preach those doctrines that control actions. The people do not want to hear mediæval speculations; nor do they care whether a whale swallowed Jonah or not. There are questions which control human life. Common sense must be the test here.

The ministry is the unselfish profession. But it may not be a discredit to have high and noble ambitions provided they be ambitions for usefulness. Yours is a comforting gospel. This ought to be your great incentive. The Saviour whom you bring to men meets the great needs of human life. No door opens so rich in promise as that which admits the message of comfort and hope. Again, it is an uplifting gospel which you preach, Christianity and civilization are and have been hand in hand.

You have great problems to face. We face a growing danger in the dominance of the material over the spiritual. In trying to fulfill your great mission you must do one thing. You cannot be half preacher and half politician. The cross of Christ has led, is leading and must lead. Let the song of your life be, "In the cross of Christ I glory."

LIFE IN THE SANCTUM

AS THE NEWSPAPERS PICTURE IT

He opened the door cautiously and poking his head in, in a suggestive sort of way as if there were more to follow, inquired, "Is this the editorial rinktum?"

"The what, my friend?"

"Is this the rinktum, sinktum, sanctum, or some such place, where the editors live?"

"This is the editorial room, yes, sir. Come in."

"No, I guess I won't come in. I wanted to see what a rinktum was like, that's all. Looks like our garret, only wuss. Good day."

Blessings on the patronizing young reporter. Any one who has had experience with him will relish the story going the rounds about how he lately called on a certain minister and asked for the subject of his morning sermon. He was told that it would be an exegesis of a certain passage of Scripture. The dear young fellow went off and this is what came out in the great daily. "Rev. Dr. Blank read an exceedingly able discourse, and one entirely satisfactory to those present, on the subject 'Ecce Jesus.'"

Financier: "You literary men haven't the first idea about business. Here you have about 10,000 manuscripts piled up in this dark closet, and you say they are all paid for."

Editor Great Magazine: "Years ago."

Financier: "Just think of it! Hasn't it ever occurred to you, sir, that you are losing the interest on all the money you paid out for those useless bundles?"

Editor Great Magazine: "Ha! Ha! You financiers haven't the first idea about literature. Every one of those manuscripts is from a different author, and the whole 10,000 of them will go on buying our magazine at thirty-five cents a copy until the articles are printed."

THE WAY OF THE TRADE

"Scrivener lives and writes entirely in the future."

"Thinks the present generation is unappreciative and unsympathetic, eh?"

"No, not exactly; but he has to write his Fourth of July jokes about Christmas time, and his Christmas jokes about Fourth of July."

THE USUAL WAY

Literary Aspirant: "It must be fine to be an editor, and have an opportunity to print all that you want to say."

Experienced Newspaper Man: "Lord bless you, boy, I printed all I wanted to say in the first three weeks. Ever since then I've been filling space."

POLITICS VERSUS LETTERS

First Little Girl: "My pa is a great councilman, and gives contracts for sewers and things. Everybody has heard of him."

Second Little Girl: "My pa is an editorial writer on a great newspaper, and helps to make history. Everybody will hear of him when he dies."

ON A STRICTLY COMMERCIAL BASIS

Maiden Lady: "I am one of your old subscribers, and now I have brought in this poem that I have written for you to print. It will only take about a column and a half, I think."

Editor: "That's good. We always like to have our subscribers advertise with us. We make a special rate for poems of that length of fifty cents an inch."

WHEN "JOY WAS DUTY"

Mr. Charles Dudley Warner is credited with telling a wartime story at his own expense. He was editor of a Hartford daily, and was doing his best to arouse the patriotism of his readers. One day a typesetter came in from the composing-room and planted himself before the editor. "Well, Mr. Warner," he said, "I have determined to enlist." With mingled sensations of pride and responsibility the editor replied that he was glad to see that the man felt the call of duty. "O, it isn't that," answered the compositor, "but I'd rather be shot than try to set any more of your copy."

A BEAUTIFUL ETCHING... FREE TO... ALL

B. T. BABBITT'S

Best Baking Powder

As the originator of Yeast or Baking Powders in 1849, I was for many years the largest manufacturer of this class of goods, until through the competition from cheap and adulterated articles, the alternative presented itself of either offering a similar quality of goods or abandoning the field. I chose the latter, and for years I have been out of the market; but now, through a revulsion of public sentiment against adulterated goods, I am enabled to offer a new powder, which I have been experimenting with and perfecting during the interim.

I recommend this powder as absolutely pure—it contains neither alum, lime, nor other injurious substances, and is unexcelled by any in the market.

The illustrations in this advertisement are reduced reproductions of beautiful artists' proof etchings. The regular size is 14 x 28 inches.

I will send one of these Etchings FREE upon receipt of 25 Best Soap wrapper trade marks, or ten 1776 Soap Powder trade marks, or the coupons found in the cans of our Best Baking Powder. Inclose two-cent stamp for postage.

There are 14 beautiful pictures in this series of Etchings. A complete catalogue will be sent free upon application if stamp is inclosed.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST

Boston Thursday 22 April 1897

AT THE DAY'S BEGINNING

WHEN first thy Eies unveil, give thy soul leave
To do the like; our Bodies but forerun
The Spirit's duty. True hearts spread and heave
Unto their God, as flow'rs do to the Sun.
Give Him thy first thoughts then; so shalt thou keep Him company all day, and in Him sleep.

Yet never sleep the Sun up. Prayer shou'd
Dawn with the day. There are set, awful hours
'Twixt heaven and us: The Manna was not good
After Sun rising; far-day sullies flowers.
Rise to prevent the Sun; sleep doth sins glut,
And heaven's gate opens when this world's is shut.

Walk with thy fellow-creatures; note the hush
And whispers among them. There's not a Spring
Or Leafe but hath his Morning=hymn. Each Bush
And Oak doth know I Am. Canst thou not sing?
O leave thy cares, and follies! Go this way;
And thou art sure to prosper all the day.

Serve God before the world; let Him not go
Until thou hast a blessing; then resigne
The whole unto Him; and remember who Prevailed by wrestling, ere the Sun did shine.
Pour Oyle upon the stones; weep for thy sin;
Then journey on, and have an eie to heav'n.

BY HENRY VAUGHAN

Now for the Fish Stories!—All indications point to a great season for the anglers. "The ice is out!" How much these four little words will mean to thousands of eager sportsmen, when, in a few more days, they are flashed over the wires from the teeming lakes and rivers that make northern New England such a paradise for the angler.

Hundreds of newspapers scattered all over the land will spread the gladsome message before their readers, and at the clubs and other meeting places where disciples of the rod and reel are wont to gather "the ice is out" will be a far more absorbing topic of discussion than tariff bills or arbitration treaties.

Transportation people, and those engaged in supplying the material wants of the amateur fisherman, are all agreed that the present fishing season in New England is likely to be a "record breaker," just as was the recent hunting season in Maine. Everybody who has ever been in the habit of "going fishing" is down for a trip to his favorite haunt this spring, and hundreds more who have never tasted the delights of this glorious pastime are booked for their initial experience with rod and fly.

As far as it is within the bounds of human fallibility to foresee, the returns upon their investment of time and money are likely this year to exceed those of any previous season, too. The finny tribe, like New England weather itself, is somewhat fickle in temperament; but somehow or other it seems to be "in the air" that the fish are not only going to be big and plentiful this spring, but that they are going to rise to the fly with the unanimity and celerity of a lot of office seekers after a fat consulship.

This, at any rate, is what the guides "down" in Maine and "up" in New Hampshire are predicting, and they ought to know.

Thanks to the untiring efforts of the State and national fish commissions, supplemented by the public-spirited work of scores of private citizens, the inland waters of New England are more than ever alive with trout and salmon and bass, and the multitude of other gamey fish that the angler delights to lure.

Thanks, also, to northern New England's great transportation system, the Boston & Maine Railroad, the task of reaching these favorite fishing grounds of Rangeley, Moosehead, Winnepesaukee, Asquam, Sunapee, Champlain, Memphremagog, Willoughby and Connecticut Lakes, the White Mountains and Pemigewasset Valley, the Restigouche and other Canadian resorts, is no longer a task at all, but a distinct pleasure.

This year the facilities for reaching any and all of these famous fishing centers are better than ever before, and the sportsman leaving Boston on an early morning train finds himself enjoying a hot supper in the very heart of the Rangeley region, while if his destination be the Moosehead fishing grounds he may leave the Hub on the night express and make his first cast under the shadows of Mt. Katahdin the following afternoon.

Other points, like Winnepesaukee and Sunapee, where the fishing is excellent but the surroundings more "civilized," are reached almost before one has gotten comfortably settled for the journey.

The passenger department of the Boston & Maine—which is an official and infallible bureau of information concerning everything relating to outdoor life in New England—is prepared to furnish intending sportsmen with illustrated guide-books, tickets, time tables and "pointers" in general regarding the fishing regions along the Boston & Maine system or its connections. An application addressed to D. J. Flanders, General Passenger Agent, Boston, will meet with prompt response.

Alaska Tour.—A personally conducted tour to Alaska via Canadian Pacific Railway is about as delightful a prospect as one can imagine for the hot months of midsummer, while to those who have heard of the enchanting scenery along the line of this, America's greatest railway, it will be of especial interest. The steamer Queen, the fastest and finest of the Alaska fleet, will be used for this occasion, and the party will be under the personal direction of one of the company's trained officials, thoroughly conversant with all the sights and scenes incident to the trip. Puget Sound cities will be visited, and the return will be via St. Paul and Minneapolis, with choice of trip through the great lakes on a magnificently appointed steamer or all rail from St. Paul. $375 covers all necessary expenses of the trip. Itineraries may be obtained of H. J. Colvin, Dist. Pass. Agent, 197 Washington Street, Boston.

REV. DR. NEWMAN SMYTH of New Haven, Ct., declined to read the governor's proclamation for Fast Day on the ground that the day has become a civic holiday under the pretense of a religious observance. The governor of New Hampshire, in the proclamation which he issued for a Fast Day, expressed a similar opinion. Both these men are prominent Congregationalists, and it appears as though they represent the prevailing sentiment among the churches of our denomination in New England. These two States will no doubt soon follow the example of Massachusetts and abolish an institution which has become a travesty on religion. But the observance of Good Friday as commemorating the death of our Lord Jesus Christ has become much more general and impressive in recent years, as the multitude of special services all over the country testify. The gathering in the Old South Church, Boston, last Friday evening was no less impressive than that of previous years. This is, perhaps, the only service which Episcopalians and Congregationalists share in conducting, but the friendly feeling which prompts it comes to the surface in other communities in other ways. We have reports of many largely attended special communion services, and we are glad also to notice the use of so much music associated with the passion of Christ.

The Congregationalist has always taken pains to encourage its readers to express freely their opinions, through open or private letters, to the editors upon topics of importance. It is manifestly impossible to reproduce in our columns every communication of this character, inasmuch as our correspondence is large and constantly increasing. So far, however, as our space permits, we have from time to time used letters, in whole or in part, that we have thought would interest a reasonable number of our subscribers. Our regret has been that the large number of more extended contributions scheduled from week to week has compelled so little recognition of this other phase of our paper. With a view to making it more serviceable, we, this week, institute a new department called Our Readers' Forum, which we intend to make a regular and valuable feature of the paper. It will incorporate material hitherto appearing under the heading of Gleanings, and is designed to cover a still broader field. We therefore would encourage the sending of short communications suitable for this page. Let it be an open forum, where opinions are freely exchanged and light shed from many sources upon a great variety of subjects germane to Christian thought and labor. We are not in the habit of paying for this class of contributions, but we hope our readers will be glad of the opportunity in this way to set before others the matters that are interesting them.

Last week was prolific in Methodist conferences which transacted the usual routine business and attended to the appointments of ministers. These annual gatherings of our sister church seem to be virile and important assemblages, and the reports of them are calculated to impress the outsider with the extent and usefulness of the machinery of this strongly governed body. The New York East Conference discussed Sabbath observance at length and with spirit, and passed a resolution condemning the use of the bicycle for pleasure on Sunday. The propositions submitted by the General Conference, as to whether as many laymen as ministers should be sent every four years as delegates to this national body and as to whether women should be admitted thereto, received considerable discussion. The action upon the first proposition was generally favorable. The second fared differently at the hands of different conferences, but the New England, which is the oldest and perhaps the most influential of the one hundred or more district conferences, voted for the admission of women by a large majority, although not as large as last year. It looks now as if that cause for which its supporters have put forth strenuous and almost successful efforts is, on the whole, suffering a temporary reverse. Some ascribe it to the fact that the voting is now done by ballot instead of by the yea and nay method.

We notice that in at least two conferences the official papers of the denomination were the recipients of considerable criticism, partly on the ground that they are too high priced. Some delegates were urgent that a decided reduction be decreed and the New York Conference went so far as to express such a statement in a resolution against which, however, there was some dissent. The New England Conference, in our opinion, acted more wisely in passing a set of strong resolutions setting forth the merits of that excellent paper, the Zion's Herald, and expressing the purpose of the delegates to endeavor to extend its circulation at the present price. It is safe to say that those who know best the difficulties and problems connected with modern religious journalism would not seek to obtain a first-class journal for less than present rates. There could be but one outcome of clamor for lower rates in a denominational paper, and that would be an altogether cheaper and, we believe, less satisfactory article.

On Tuesday, April 13, Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton died at her home in Brooklyn. More than twenty-five years ago her husband, Theodore Tilton, with others, accused her of having had criminal relations with Henry Ward Beecher. Finally, Mr. Tilton prosecuted Mr. Beecher in a trial whose details were spread abroad throughout the Christian world. Mr. Beecher maintained a vigorous denial of the charge against him. The jury disagreed and were discharged without having rendered a verdict. Mr. Tilton removed to Paris, where he still lives. If any good ever has come from thrusting on the public the repulsive details of that trial, or any satisfaction to those who made the charges, we have never heard of it. But the shame and sorrow which fell on Christian homes and hearts, the reproaches heaped on churches, the exultation of multitudes of evil-minded men and women, and the embittered friendships of thousands who took sides in discussion as to the innocency or guilt of the accused, only faintly can be imagined now, after more than a score of years have passed, though there are still many unhealed scars. This much, at least, may be said of the woman whose life was blasted by the fires of that trial. She has ever since lived in modest retirement, seeking only to let the veil of oblivion fall on her history. Even her passing away was unknown to her neighbors till the certificate of her death was filed in the office of the health department. The memories it recalls cannot but suggest the jealous care with which Christian men and women should avoid even the appearance of evil. Not less do they emphasize the warning against making public charges of such wrongdoing unless the evidence for it is decisive and the purpose is clearly understood to be for the public welfare.

Our Armenian Orphans' Fund has passed the $24,000 mark, and we have every reason to hope that it will reach the round sum of $25,000, and perhaps even go beyond that goal. The sum already raised is several times larger than our most sanguine expectations dared to hope for when the fund was started, five months ago. All this while the need and suffering on the field have been acute and widespread, though relief measures have in many places been coping bravely and efficiently with the problem. We present elsewhere in this issue an interesting batch of letters, showing what our fund has already accomplished and how jubilant of heart its recipients are. Those administering it are wise and capable missionaries of the American Board, and money intrusted to them is sure to go a long way and to increase the area of sunshine in that darkened and desolate region.

One effect of differences between pastors and their people is seen in the growing disposition of churches and societies, when calling ministers, to make provision for the proper termination of the relation proposed. Several churches in New England which have recently sought new leaders have inserted clauses in the contract to the effect that either party could terminate it upon three or six months' notice. In all probability few parishes realize how binding the present law is upon them after they have once installed a pastor, unless some such proviso as that referred to has been made for possible differences. Few cases of prolonged controversy ever arise, but when they do they are exploited widely. Therefore the churches grow wary of entering into the pastoral relation. We believe, thoroughly, in installing ministers instead of hiring them, and if a safeguard is considered desirable we see no objection to it. Dr. Quint, with his customary acuteness, recognized the growing possibility of trouble arising from installation on the old pattern and one of the last editorials which he wrote for us outlined methods whereby such disagreeable results could be obviated. That which he principally advocated was a clause in the contract to the effect that either party may terminate the connection upon three months' notice, provided such separation be advised by a mutual ecclesiastical council to the calling of which each party agrees to join upon the request of the other. This method Dr. Quint considered more Congregational than to leave the dissolution of the pastorate optional with either party after sufficient notice.

Speculation is a passion which wrecks fortunes, bodies, characters, communities, nations. Many men reach after immense possible results rather than take assured small ones. They prefer the bucket shop to the savings bank. The unknown patent medicine has more value in their eyes than that whose composition is understood and whose operation has been tested by professional experts. The "divine healer" or the "Christian Scientist" is trusted rather than the trained physician. Crowds of citizens shout themselves hoarse in praise of the orator who has some panacea which never has been tried but which he warrants to remove all national ills. Here and there one gains money. Some real or imaginary bodily ills are cured. Spasmodic impulses may be created toward national prosperity. But every sensible man knows that all these speculations offer immense risks and yield small returns. The many are duped, the few reap the rewards. Honest labor, diligent study, reliance on experience insure safety. Gambling in business, in medicine, in government, in religion is immoral. Its consequences are disastrous. To warn men against it and to offer the sure rewards of honesty is to preach a genuine gospel, fitted especially to the needs of this time.

Berkeley University has received a grant from the last California legislature which increases its current income by $100,000, making the total nearly $400,000. For ten years one-half of the additional sum is to be used for permanent improvements, and the balance will be spent in perfecting various branches of instruction. While the institution cannot be called religious, a number of its young men and women are organized for Christian work, headquarters for which are in a handsome brick hall, purposely provided at an expense of $50,000 by Mrs. Stiles, for years identified with our Congregational churches, at present a member of Berkeley, First. The pastor of the latter and his co-workers in the other pulpits appreciate the responsibility of ministering to such a large and influential university.

THEOLOGY AND EVOLUTION

The Bible no more contains the history of the earth than the earth contains the history of redemption. The Bible is the record of God's revelation of himself through human experience. The theologian, with what he finds written there, forms his theories about God, and about man, his origin, nature and destiny. The earth contains the history of its own development in its successive strata of fossils, rocks and soil. The evolutionist, with what he finds written there, forms his theories of the creation of the earth and of the changes through which it has come into its present condition.

Theology is the science of God, who is a spirit, in his relations with the spiritual life of man. Evolution has come to stand for the science which seeks to account for the earth's history by the development of higher out of lower organic forms. Both these sciences have to do with the Creator and Preserver of all things, but his methods of creating and preserving all things are not completely revealed in either record. When, therefore, the theologian insists on correcting the earth's history of itself by the Bible, and the evolutionist insists on explaining the spiritual life of man by what he digs out of the earth, they do not convince, but confuse men's minds. Each of these sciences modifies the other, but neither can command the other in its own sphere.

There are evolutionists who maintain that matter and motion are the only forces in the development of the universe. To these the theologian may justly reply that they have no right to deny that God exists because they do not recognize him; that they assume a knowledge of the non-existence of God which they do not possess. There are evolutionists who claim that the power behind the processes of nature is unknown and unknowable. To these the theologian may reasonably urge that he has access to truth in the Bible and in human experience with God which they have not yet explored. There are evolutionists who believe that God is the creator of all things, and that he is working out in the universe his designed results according to the processes of natural laws. With these the theologian would do well to confine his discussion to ascertained facts.

Thus far, when evolutionists have discovered facts and theologians have reasoned back from inferences drawn from the facts to prove that the facts did not exist, the theologians have sadly failed. The history of the relations between theology and evolution during the present century might well be pondered by those who would disprove evolution from the Bible. A suggestive article may be found in the April Harper's on The Paleontological Progress of the Century. A hundred years ago, when William Smith made known his discovery of successive strata of fossils, the inference that the creation of the world required a long period of time was bitterly denied by theologians who held to the six days' succession of creative fiats. They undertook to explain the position of fossils by the Noachian deluge. Some of them, who claimed to have knowledge of the matter, declared that God put the fossils where they were found on purpose to deceive these explorers of the earth who taught false doctrines. But no intelligent student of the Bible now believes that the world was created in six days.

Some thirty years later, when theologians were beginning to adjust their views to the theory of successive periods of great length, which they called days, each period ending with some great catastrophe, Charles Lyell presented evidences that distinct species were not suddenly exterminated, but died out one by one, as they are now dying out. Again theologians fought the inference that natural laws have continued unchanged from the beginning. But who now defends the theory of catastrophic periods and special creations?

About forty years ago appeared Darwin's Origin of Species, assuming to demonstrate that natural selection has been the efficient cause of the evolving of higher out of lower organic forms. The discussion of Darwinism by the pulpit and the press is still fresh in the minds of many of our readers. Denunciation has mostly died away as new facts have been discovered till most theologians who know anything about the facts can discuss temperately the questions involved, while by many, and a rapidly increasing number, the doctrine of evolution is accepted as a working hypothesis by which they may discern in the processes of nature the mind of God.

Is it not then evident that theology and evolution are not in themselves antagonistic? Each science has its own sphere. Each may shed light on the other. Those who seek to know God will reverently explore both the earth and the Bible, not to find in the one that which denies the testimony of the other, but to find each interpreting the other. He is a poor theologian who undertakes to overthrow the science of evolution, concerning which he not only has no experimental knowledge, but which he cannot even define correctly; while he is a poor evolutionist whose discoveries in the earth have taught him so little that he assumes to deny the presence and the existence of God. Nor is he less narrow in his knowledge if, admitting the existence, he presumes to describe and limit the operations of God or his purposes concerning human lives. If evolution is proved, God is still our Father.

APRIL HOPES

Tantalizing April, with her invitations, promises, delays and disappointments, almost makes us doubt the auguries of spring. Her whims and quirks, her capricious sunshine and fitful showers, reveal a wayward and fantastic humor which plays with our impatience, while it never quite discourages our hope. Our eagerness, indeed, outruns the movement of the season and makes us forget that in our Northern world April is not the ripener but the forerunner. It is not her fault that east winds must have time to blow. It is her task to put in order the house long tenanted by careless winter. With besom of the wind, affusion of soft rain and desiccating sunlight she cleans and orders the world, while she leaves the study of ornament and the attainment of a wide perfection to her sister May.

Yet, in the midst of all the dust which March has blown about her floors, her voice has a cheerful note. While she is busy with her task of settling the dead leaves in their final resting place, and getting rid of the dry grass and tangle of weed stalks and all the other rubbish which winter left behind, her light hands leave touches of inimitable perfection here and there—precursors of the larger triumph of life and beauty in which she is to have no part. "Look!" she says, "at the crimson of these maple blossoms spread like the flush of hope along the boughs, at the living emerald of the grain fields, this spendthrift profusion of marsh-marigolds, this mountainside blue with houstonia, these white clusters of saxifrage in the crannies of the rocks, these aments hanging from the alder boughs!" And when she has shown us what she delights to do, she goes back cheerfully to the prosaic task of clearing up and making ready, which she executes in such a frolicsome spirit.

Is it not true, as her example shows, that beauty has a higher meaning when it does not make the whole of life? It needs the background of duty, the relief of contrast. There are so many April lives, busy with drudgery, serving the needs of others with little thought of recognition or reward, clearing away the troubles others have left behind them, living constrained and narrow lives for love's sake, and only in rare and fleeting moments able to find strength for the expression of their real selves in thought or beauty. The world would be happier if such ministrant souls had more consideration. Even willing service is lighter and more effective for grateful recognition and due intervals of rest. At least, however, the few enjoyments of the self-denying have a zest that pleasure seekers never taste, and their glimpses of beauty have all the freshness and delight of the first spring flowers.

April is fortunate in showing her delights against the background of the wintry earth. Her violets would attract but little notice amid the luxury of June, when delicate blossoms are lost in the lush growth of the meadow. But on a sunny day of early spring, when not a leaf is out and the buds are waiting for the impulse of the first warm April shower, the forest nooks are brilliant with clustered hepaticas against the dull background of the brown and sodden leaves. Their beauty and their unexpectedness thrill our hearts with a sudden shock of delight, which June, with all her charms, would find it hard to match.

Down by the riverside the fishermen are painting their boats and mending their nets. Brush heaps are burning and the air is full of the pungent smell of smoke. Straight lines on the fresh turned garden soil tell us where the early peas are growing. Upon a child's desk there lies a freshly drawn map of a flower garden that is to be—every stroke of the pen a witness of April hopes. The impatient robins begin to make ready for their housekeeping on the very first day of the month. Out of the covert of the pine branches the wife darts down to scold her lazy husband as he struts about the lawn, and flies back with an astonishing mouthful of dried grass and sticks. Fortunate will she be if freakish April does not scatter snow feathers upon her brooding wings.

To the birds April speaks with a soft distinctness which our dull ears fail to grasp. She marshals them upon their homeward way and keeps them flying and singing about her freakish skirts. Passerella, the fox sparrow, largest and most beautiful of his tribe, follows her week by week, lingers while she lingers, advances when she beckons toward the north. She sweeps the scattered flocks of winter residents before her. The swallows dart about her head as she advances. The red mavis and the other thrushes follow after. To the gray snowbirds, whose happy life all winter long has found vocal expression only in a chirp, she teaches music, touching the chords of memory and hope until they answer in a happy, tranquil song of glad anticipation. The mystery of transition and renewal, the beauty of green pastures and still waters and God's renewal of the soul, find an echo in the snowbird's heart as certainly as in the heart of man. April's capricious moods add zest to expectation. April's gifts of flower and leaf are doubly precious for the hopes and promises of larger things to come.

MINISTERIAL STANDING

This subject has been extensively discussed in our denominational assemblies. It has been a prominent topic in national councils. The first triennial council, in 1871, declared that every Congregational minister ought to be connected in an orderly way with some ministerial or ecclesiastical organization capable of certifying to his continued standing. On this principle the roll of ministers in the Year-Book is compiled.

The council of 1886 unanimously agreed that ministerial standing is secured by these steps: "(1) Membership in a Congregational church; (2) ordination to the Christian ministry; (3) reception as an ordained minister into the fellowship of the Congregational churches in accordance with the usage of the State or territorial organization of churches in which the applicant may reside." The council of 1895, after spending much time on this subject, concluded that it could not do better than to reaffirm the position taken by the Council of 1886.

According to these declarations, ministerial standing is in several States completed by membership in an association of ministers, but in the larger part of the country by membership in local conferences or associations of churches. It is plainly the duty of these bodies not to receive ministers into membership without sufficient evidence that they are members of Congregational churches, and have been ordained to the Christian ministry, since these conditions have been established by common consent. Cases have sometimes occurred in which this evidence has not been furnished, yet persons have been voted into membership as Congregational ministers. Such neglect is a violation of the principle of fellowship. It has resulted in scandals, for which the whole denomination suffers. Because we have no ecclesiastical court of appeal, and our association as churches is voluntary, the responsibility of each local body of ministers and churches is the greater to guard the honor of the entire body.

It is a reasonable principle also, as expressed in the deliverance of the council, that an applicant for ministerial standing must apply for membership to the organization of ministers or churches where he resides. It is contrary to this principle for a person under ordinary conditions to apply for ministerial standing to a Congregational body in one State while he is living in another State. Such a body by receiving him would violate the principle of fellowship. The honor of the churches requires that they be loyal to one another.

When a candidate for ministerial standing who has been suspended or dropped by a conference or association applies for membership in another body of churches, he acts contrary to the established principles of the denomination. He cannot be restored to ministerial standing by being received into membership in one association while under suspension in another. Councils have repeatedly agreed that ministerial standing is to be continued in accordance with the usages we have already described, "it being understood that a pro re natâ council is the ultimate resort in all cases in question."

The principles we have stated have a wide application. They should be thoroughly understood by all Congregational ministers and churches. The protection of the ministry and the maintenance of fellowship are necessary, not only to the peace and purity, but to the life, of the churches. In our form of government responsibility for these necessary things rests peculiarly on the local bodies to whom the standing of ministers is committed. The rules adopted by the council of 1886, and reaffirmed by the council of 1895, are reasonable rules. It is for the welfare of all the churches that they should be faithfully and consistently observed.

THE CULTIVATION OF CONTENTMENT

It is important to appreciate what contentment is. To misunderstand it is easy. It is not phlegmatic, stolid acquiescence in whatever has come to pass, or seems about to come to pass, in our lives. Some people profess to be contented who are only lazy. Contentment is rather an active than a passive virtue. It involves doing one's best to shape events as we desire them, working one's hardest to prevent threatening evil, understanding and living up to the truth that God expects and wishes us to be interested and active in caring for our own welfare. But when we have planned and striven our utmost, contentment means accepting then what comes, convinced that it is what divine love has ordained. Contentment is not the same thing with resignation. Resignation accepts an event uncomplainingly yet with regret. It does not murmur against God but it wishes that his will had been different. Contentment not only accepts his ordering but is calm and serene in so doing. It rests so fully and firmly upon God that, once assured of his will, it would not alter that will if it could.

The value of such a spirit is apparent. No wonder that it is exalted as a conspicuous Christian virtue. To attain it is not easy. To cultivate it is not often agreeable. But to possess it is sweet, and to illustrate it is to preach the gospel impressively. The absolute, loyal, controlling trust in God which it unobtrusively demonstrates makes a stronger appeal to doubting, inquiring souls than almost anything else can possibly make.

Theodore Roosevelt, in his letter resigning his police commissionership, says that one of his pleasantest experiences has been working with all men, rich and poor, priests and laymen, Catholics and Protestants, Jews and Gentiles, who are striving to make civic conditions better, to raise the standard of living, of morality and of comfort among the less fortunate brethren. Certainly the only way in which any municipality can redeem itself is by such an alliance of all the forces that respond to the appeal for a better public order.

CURRENT HISTORY

The Congressional Mill

The House, adjourning at short intervals, awaits action by the Senate on the tariff. The Senate Finance Committee, in secret, labors over the new schedules, and rumors of all sorts leak out about new rates and deals, political and sectionary, the most alarming to New England manufacturers being the one that credits the Senate with a purpose to impose a duty on hides, in order to protect the interests of Western cattle raisers, which decision would probably be ratified by the House if it were the will of the Senate. Senator Vest's motion, if carried, would have been a censure of Secretary of the Treasury Gage for conforming to the requirements and exegencies of the situation as created by the House when it passed the "retrospective" section of the Dingley Bill; and it failed to pass only for the lack of two votes, so closely are the lines drawn in the Senate and so small will be the majority for the new tariff, whatever the form in which it passes. The arbitration treaty is in a state of suspended animation, and its few friends seem indisposed to force the test vote which they fear will kill it. How far reaching in its effect and influence this action will be when it comes, if come it must as now seems certain, may be inferred from the following sentences from the London Chronicle, which has been so ardent in its advocacy of cordial Anglo American relations:

> If America and England cannot agree even on a formula of arbitration, is Europe ever likely to approach the subject in any practical form? There, in our opinion and not in any injury to the interests of this country, lies the real evil of the decision of the Senate. It is a blow to peace, to the betterment of mankind. The hope of arbitrators on both sides of the Atlantic was that the Anglo-American example would be the beginning of a better era for the old world. If the treaty is to sink amid the wreck of the Senate's amendments, it would have been better had it never been drafted. For here is a plain confession that two nations, closely akin, vitally associated in blood, history, literature, language, cannot agree on a peaceful method of settling their differences, and that it is a popularly elected body in one of these countries which bars the way. If England and America cannot come together, what hope is there that Frenchman and German, Russian and Austrian, will lay down their arms?

The United States Minister to Turkey

President McKinley has happily solved the problem, which has given him no little worry, by selecting as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Turkey James Burrill Angell, LL. D., since 1871 president of the University of Michigan, and prior to that professor of modern languages and literature in Brown University—his alma mater—and then president of the University of Vermont. These facts speak for the mental power and intellectual rank of the man. His Christian character and loyalty to the church have been demonstrated by long years of service in our denomination. Consequently, were he a novitiate in diplomacy his advent in Constantinople would herald a new era, full of inspiration to all American citizens resident in Turkey. But he is a man of much experience in this line of work, far more so than most American publicists.

In 1880 President Hayes appointed him minister to China, especially instructed to negotiate treaties governing our commercial relations and the still more delicate matter of restriction of immigration. He accomplished the task in a few months and in 1881 resigned this post and returned to the University of Michigan. It is understood that this will be much the manner of his career in Constantinople. Once delicate and rigorous duties are performed, he will resign the post to another man less needed at home. In 1887 President Cleveland named President Angell as one of the commission to settle the dispute with Great Britain over the rights of American fishermen in Canadian waters.

The Administration has reflected honor on itself by its choice of President Angell. The task he is to undertake is in many respects uninviting, though it certainly is not uninteresting. He may feel assured of the confidence of those of his countrymen who have most at stake in the Turkish empire, and we trust that they will appreciate the limitations with which he will be surrounded. The appointment of such a man to this difficult and delicate position indicates that the situation has received careful consideration from the President and his Cabinet, and that he will be supported in his efforts to secure just treatment of American citizens and to maintain the dignity of our Government. The property of Americans long resident in Turkey has been destroyed. They have been shot at by Turkish troops and arrested on trumped up charges and then refused trial. Demands for reparation filed by us in 1895 have been ignored. A time to cry halt, to make the stars and stripes respected in Turkey, has come, and we believe that President Angell will make a brilliant record for himself and do a patriotic service for his country if he is given the right degree of authority and support. This, among other things, certainly implies that some of our fleet remain in Turkish waters, even though the Bancroft never attempts to pass the Dardanelles, until reparation is made.

PRESIDENT ANGELL

Our present Minister Terrell is to be congratulated on having secured the release of a naturalized American citizen who was arrested in Mitylene, Feb. 8, charged with homicide. Minister Terrell has been insisting ever since that he be turned over to him for trial, in compliance with treaty stipulations. Turkey has refused, claiming that his naturalization in this country was not a protection, since Turkey denied the right of one of her subjects to expatriate himself.

"The Spoils Theory" Rampant

Republican delegates from many hundred clubs waited on President McKinley last week and urged that he rescind President Cleveland's recent extension of civil service rules. Senator Lexow, supported by Governor Black of New York, has introduced legislation at Albany which, if made a Republican caucus measure and passed, will throw the spoils of that State back into the hands of the Machine politicians. Chairman Lauterbach of the New York Republican County Committee frankly said last week:

> I know that you are as one man resolved that the battle of November shall be waged under the banner of partisan Republicanism, that the man who shall be elevated to the high office of mayor should be a true Republican. If we cannot succeed in bringing about that result, better far that there should be placed in power a true Democrat, even a Tammany Hall Democrat, than that we should aid to elect to that state of power and place a man of no party, whose administration is responsible to no party, and who has no party at its back. It is probably true that the doctrinaires who are now sowing the seeds of non-partisanship will draw more from the Republican ranks than from those of the Democracy. The temptation will be great to make a fusion with them. That temptation must be shunned. Victory with fusion is fruitless. Better a defeat to party than such a victory.

That is a frank admission by one of Mr. Platt's lieutenants that the vast machinery of greater New York is to be operated by politicians for the spoils there are in it, and that the Republican Machine and the Democratic Machine will assist each other to defeat non partisan, honest government if they can. What do the Republican leaders think that these flagrant attempts to alienate the independent, conservative elements of society will effect? Do they spurn such aid? A day of reckoning will come. The local elections in New Jersey last week confirm the drift seen in the elections of the prior week. The American people have memories, and do not always wear Machine-made collars.

A Loss to Science

From the ranks of American scientists of international repute has been removed Edward D. Cope, professor of zoölogy and comparative anatomy in the University of Pennsylvania, who died in Philadelphia April 12 at the age of fifty-seven. Some of the obituary tributes to him rank him as the foremost man of science among us. Be that as it may, his contributions to the lore and learning of his special department of study are many and important enough to give him permanent renown. Between 1864 and 1896 he put forth no less than 350 pamphlets, monographs and reports containing a wealth of information touching fossiliferous remains and the broad field of paleontology. Most of these grew out of actual personal discoveries made in a series of expeditions to various parts of North America. The notable quality in all of Professor Cope's scientific work was the background of what perhaps could hardly be called faith in the religious sense but its practical equivalent from a scientific standpoint. Though a thorough disciple of Darwin, Professor Cope never rested content with any mechanical theory concerning the origin of the universe. Behind visible phenomena he felt the existence of a force which transcends and originates them. He was aiding powerfully, at the time of his death, the scientific movement of the day that is making for the ends of the kingdom of God.

The Paris Exhibition of 1900

If the United States is to be adequately represented at the universal exposition which France is to hold in Paris in 1900, action should be taken at this session of Congress. To secure that end the President last week sent a special message to Congress, calling the attention of the legislators to the matter, and urging that they deal promptly and generously with it. Secretary of State Sherman, in a letter to the President, transmitted with the message to Congress, says, sensibly:

> The purpose of the government of the French republic now is to make the forthcoming exposition the most notable of the century, in order to fittingly round the history of an era in which such international displays have filled a most important part, by bringing the nations together in the interests of commerce and of friendship. Recalling not only the prominent part taken by the United States in such enterprises heretofore in foreign countries, but also the cordial interest shown by the French nation and people in our own Columbian Exposition at Chicago, it is desirable, and indeed imperative, that provision be now made commensurate, not alone with the records of the past, but with the unparalleled scale upon which France proposes to conduct this new exposition.

He recommends an appropriation of $350,000.

War Begun

War has begun on the frontier between Greece and Turkey, the Greeks being the aggressors. Diplomatic relations have been severed between them formally. The fighting began on Saturday night and extended along the whole frontier from Previsa, on the gulf of Arta on the west, to the gulf of Salonica on the east. The Turkish batteries at Previsa sunk the Greek steamer Macedonian at the entrance of the gulf of Arta, and then were silenced themselves by the Greek flotilla. The chief conflict on land centered at the Milouna Pass. Here the Turks under Edhem Pasha had concentrated a strong force, meaning to invade Greece through the pass and capture Larissa. The Greek defense made vigorous use of three blockhouses, but was at last overcome. Neither side seems to have gained great advantage, but the Turks accomplished somewhat more than the Greeks. A day or two more may make great changes in the situation.

A long war is unlikely. The two nations probably will be allowed by the other Powers to fight until some radical alteration of the general international situation is threatened, and then will be checked. Each of the two combatants is practically bankrupt, and this fact will shorten their conflict. Greece doubtless can easily annihilate what little there is left of the Turkish navy, and although her army is much smaller than the Turkish—not more than one seventh as large—she has the advantage of position, and, if she can kindle a fire of revolt behind the Turks in Macedonia, her prospects of success are by no means to be despised. The outcome, however, depends upon what the other Powers decide to allow, and the vital question really is whether they, or a sufficient number of them, can unite upon a policy. If they would allow it, the Greek navy probably would speedily bombard Constantinople and bring matters thus to a crisis.

Spain's Brighter Outlook

If official reports are reliable, the revolt in the Philippines is practically ended. This fact, if it be one, together with a better understanding with the United States and a more lenient treatment of all prisoners of war in Cuba, indicates that Spain's skies are brightening. A special envoy for Spain, sent from Cuba to Washington, has been in conference there during the past week with the leaders of the Cuban Junta, and there are those who predict that Spain and the revolutionists are about to come to terms. There is good authority for the statement that Spain plans to withdraw her troops from Cuba very speedily, and this step could only precede two others, confession of failure or concessions to the revolutionists.

NOTES

The United States Senate adjourned from Thursday to Monday out of respect for Good Friday. Senator Gorman moved so to do.

France and Brazil have agreed to arbitrate the Guiana boundary dispute. The president of the Swiss republic will serve as arbitrator.

The rumor from Rome that the commander of the international fleet in Cretan waters has been informed that the United States does not recognize the blockade is too good to be true.

At a conference of presidents of American colleges, held in New York city last week, a strongly worded petition against the Dingley tariff on books, even in its amended form, was drafted to be sent to the Senate revision committee.

President McKinley's appointee to the important position of Indian commissioner, W. A. Jones of Wisconsin, is too little known in the East for us as yet to speak advisedly respecting the choice. At all events we trust the present excellent superintendent of Indian schools, Dr. Hailmann, will be retained. Let not the spoilsmen lay hands on him, Mr. President.

Our Chicago correspondent describes the ruin wrought in the affairs of the University of Illinois by the rascality of a Chicago bank official. We have a similar case of greater dimensions nearer home. Two of the New Bedford cotton mills are found to have $2,400,000 more indebtedness than was supposed, and the cashier confesses to grave misrepresentation of the finances during past years.

The Mississippi floods have wrought ruin over a wide extent of country. So great was the volume of waters in Louisiana that last Saturday the main levee system began to give way, and the finest cotton producing land in the country was inundated. Similar disasters are reported at points further north, while the situation in the Red River Valley of Dakota is vividly portrayed on another page.

No tragedy for some time has so shocked the moral sense of New England as the brutal murder, April 16, of Joseph A. Stickney, cashier of the Somersworth (N. H.) National Bank. It was done in broad daylight and the murder was only preliminary to the robbery of the safe. Some $6,000 in cash were taken and carried away in a bag, through the streets in open view of several persons whose suspicions were not aroused in time to overtake the assassin. He was, however, arrested in Montreal last Monday night. Mr. Stickney was over seventy years old and an esteemed citizen. He was one of the mainstays of the local Congregational church, of which Rev. Henry Hyde is pastor.

IN BRIEF

One of the most noteworthy of the Passiontide services was the noonday gathering each day of Holy Week at the Chamber of Commerce in San Francisco, at which local clergymen spoke.

Twenty-seven members of the United States Congress were born in other countries. But that is no valid argument against immigration. All the officers of the colonial governments of New England for a number of years were born in other lands, but we look back to those days with a just pride.

"A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of noise which he makes." That was said in the course of a friendly tribute to a quiet but efficient and useful man who passed away in a western Massachusetts city last week. How prone the world is today to set up a standard of judgment which estimates a man by the display and commotion attending his career.

Our April Handbook is now ready and in view of the deepening war clouds in the East it is especially timely. Entitled Turkey and Turkish problems, it is a reprint of the article by Rev. Edwin Hallock Byington in our issue of March 18. It was widely commented upon by the newspapers of the country and in its present cheap and convenient form can be easily circulated.

It will be a good thing for those misguided persons who went into raptures over the Hindu sage, Vivekananda, when he was in this country to see what he says about American women now that he is back in India. His own words, as reported by Dr. F. E. Clark in this issue, condemn him, and yet he is hailed everywhere as "your Holiness." It is marvelous how a certain type of feminine mind, even in enlightened America, is fascinated by a solemn mien, Oriental robes and aversion to roast beef.

The advent of spring quickens Christian zeal in one particular, at least. Those who believe in open air preaching, and we rejoice to say that the number of such persons is increasing, are already planning for a better season's work than ever before. There is a good degree of interest hereabouts in such methods of reaching the unchurched, and a conference is to be held, under the auspices of the Open Air Association, next Monday in the Bromfield Street Church at 11.30 A. M., with addresses by Drs. Plumb, Blackburn, Bates and others.

The vacancy caused by Dr. Stimson's declination has been most wisely filled by the election of Dr. Lucien C. Warner as president of the Congregational Church Building Society. Dr. Warner's warm, practical interest in, and liberal support of, the Church Building, along with our other national Congregational societies and other denominational interests, is well understood. This, with his equally well known energy and capacity for successful business, marks him out as eminently the man for the place in this time when such qualities are especially needed.

Two petitions were before the railroad commissioners of this State last week, one asking for a permit to conduct a local express between Boston and a neighboring town, and the other opposing that petition and declaring that the present service was satisfactory. A number of names were the same on both petitions. The fact was brought out that these petitioners wanted to help both sides. They seem not to have thought anything about the public, in whose behalf they professed to plead, nor to have realized that they were giving only sham help with names that were good for nothing.

Easter broke upon the world with an outpouring of sunshine that is rarely equaled at this season of the year. And the day which had so perfect a beginning rounded out to as fair a close while all through its hours great processions streamed in and out of the churches and joyous Easter greetings passed from lip to lip. The popular churches in the great cities were thronged to overflowing. Special music, lavish floral decorations, sermons on the resurrection, concert exercises in which the sweet voices of children were heard—all these helped to express and enforce the central truth of Christendom's great est festival. Surely Christ is more highly exalted in the world today than ever before.

Not long ago a man who had been drawing a comfortable salary as a Christian worker in Boston, on leaving his position, publicly attacked ministers and churches, hiring a large hall for the purpose. He kept up his tirades for several months, but soon his published promises of sensational rant failed to draw audiences, and he was able to find accommodation for his hearers in a small room. The daily papers announce in two lines that he is "a voluntary petitioner in insolvency." When he was an involuntary petitioner in mental insolvency they devoted columns to his petitions. Does not his fate suggest that sensational criticism of ministers and churches soon becomes as stale in journalism as on the platform?

There are penalties as well as rewards because of one's resemblance to men conspicuous in the public eye. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton was walking the streets of Chicago the other day with Dr. Willard Scott. Suddenly the street arabs began to cry out, "You didn't get there, did you, Hesing?" It took the Detroit divine several minutes to comprehend the joke, but finally, through Dr. Scott's kindly assistance, the truth made itself apparent that Dr. Boynton's flowing side whiskers and portly build made the youngsters think that they were gazing upon Postmaster Hesing, one of the defeated candidates for mayor. We are indeed surprised that a man whose garb, demeanor and terminology are so distinctively ministerial should ever be mistaken for a hustling politician.

Easter Sunday sees no more beautiful outgo of Christian love than that represented by Rev. D. W. Waldron's mission, which for seventeen years has conveyed to the hospitals, homes and charitable institutions of Boston the good wishes of the outside world as embodied in cards, leaflets and papers. This year the little party which comprised the mission, by starting at 6 o'clock in the morning and continuing until 7 o'clock in the evening, was able to give a personal greeting to over 2,000 inmates of these institutions and to hold services at seven points. Fully as many more cards and papers were sent for distribution at other institutions which could not be visited. What one poor fellow with limbs shattered by a recent railroad accident said, as a pretty card was handed him, expresses the feelings of hundreds to whom like comfort was offered: "I'm glad somebody thinks of me."

FROM NEW YORK

Work for Quiet Sabbaths

The New York Sabbath Committee, consisting of fifteen well-known and influential Christian gentlemen, has now been in active service for forty years, during the last twenty-five of which Dr. William W. Atterbury has been its laborious and ever watchful secretary. The report of its two latest years, just issued, is full of encouragement and hope, particularly to one who has watched the progress of the work for thirty years, and can contrast the present condition of the effort for Sunday observance here with that of a generation ago. The world does move, the Lord does bless the toil of his faithful servants, does work his will through them, and it is not in vain to labor for the prevalence of his laws, even amidst obstacles that seem insurmountable in a city so cosmopolitan as this. Evidently the committee's success has been largely due to two things—the wisdom of its methods and its perseverance. It has carefully kept from taking extreme or untenable ground, from pushing even judicious measures violently; it has not enforced legal penalties where it could prevail by appeals to the reason, the conscience, or awakened regard for the welfare of the offender himself and his victims. Its chief and most effective appeal has been for Sunday as a day of rest for the army of the overworked. Thus it has enlisted in its aid Protestants, Roman Catholics, Jews and the religiously unclassified—all who care for the rights of their fellowmen. A great amount of watchfulness and judicious work has been given to the prevention of unwise, and the securing of wise, legislation, thus preventing ofttimes the necessity of exciting opposition by the enforcement of penalties upon lawbreakers. And when defeated once, twice, thrice, the committee has quietly bided its time and kept on working until its end was gained. Among its other items of value this report—which Dr. Atterbury, 31 Bible House, will send for the asking—gives a succinct account of recent changes in Sunday laws, judicial decisions upon mooted points, etc., throughout the country, with brief statements concerning Sunday observance in Europe.

Keeping up the Standard

The Manhattan Ministerial Association held its spring meeting with the New England Church, East Brooklyn. Most of the session was occupied with the examination of four Congregational Seniors about to graduate from Union Seminary, Messrs. Stephen H. Barrett, Homer W. Hildreth, James A. Rain and Antonio Testa. The examination in each case was satisfactory and the young men were commended to the churches.

An unusual episode, unique indeed for the Manhattan, occurred in connection with the examination. A member, and he, for a wonder, a Harvard graduate and ex-professor there, in a report on examination of candidates, proposed the dropping of the examination in Hebrew, and called the insistence on the study of that language "a stupid thing." This caused Dr. Behrends's hair to stand on end, the idea in broaching the subject having been to raise, instead of lowering, the standard of requirement of those looking to fill Congregational pulpits. The matter was tabled and the candidates were "put through" the usual drill in the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, and Dr. Behrends was appointed to speak at the next meeting on the Value of Greek and Hebrew to the Modern Minister. When a movement is made for lowering the standard of qualifications for the Congregational pulpit, it will not begin in the Manhattan Association.

Baiting for Better Things

Another move towards regenerating the Bowery and helping the poor wanderers whom it allures to their moral death has been started by the Christian Herald. One of the lowest of the low haunts of that thoroughfare, a conglomerate of barroom, dance hall, theater and "Raines law hotel," has been leased by the proprietors of that paper and placed under the care of the Bowery mission, which, having worked in the neighborhood for eighteen years, knows the territory, its denizens, their habits, wants, accessible points, etc. The mission is transforming the premises into a cheap restaurant, with a capacity for feeding 5,000 men daily. The superintendent says that for five cents he will give a good, substantial meal of coffee, bread, oatmeal and milk or pork and beans, beef stew or corned beef hash. For ten cents he promises a regular dinner—soup, roast beef or steak, two vegetables, bread, with milk or coffee and pie or pudding. If not allowed to degenerate into a mere premium on lazy beggary, which the experience of the mission workers should enable them to prevent, this ministry to bodily wants ought to open the way to spiritual profit. Otherwise its usefulness to the city and those who are fed is questionable.

Greater New York

The long agony is not over yet. The charter, without amendment of even one of the faults pointed out in Mayor Strong's veto and others shown in the protests of many wise and good citizens, was "jammed through" the legislature and is in the governor's hands for his signature. A carefully chosen committee goes to Albany to plead with him to withhold approval, and from fifty to a hundred of our trusted and responsible men of mark volunteer to go with them as helpers. But the governor, chosen by the people to represent them, is one man and the boss in the national Senate, chosen by himself to represent himself in our city and State, is quite another. He has said, "Put the charter through," and usually what he says goes. If it does go in this case, then will begin another agony, longer and sharper, before honest citizens will consent that the metropolitan district shall be given over to jobbers and plunderers.

Our Libraries.

The needed State and city legislation has at last settled the question of the removal of the reservoir from Bryant Park (Fifth to Sixth Avenues and Fortieth to Forty-second Streets) and the erection in its stead of a superb library building for the Astor, Lenox and Tilden collections, present and future. The work of removal is to begin as soon as the new water mains are in place. The estimated cost to the city is $2,500,000; the actual cost can be more definitely stated after the building is ready for use.

The director of the Public Library reports the number of readers in the Astor, in 1895, 85,182; Lenox, 9,149. In 1896, Astor, 96,260; Lenox, 13 228. Number of volumes consulted in 1895, Astor, 225,477; Lenox, 35,217. In 1896, Astor, 236,513; Lenox, 55,692. Works on American history called for in the Lenox in 1895, 10,711; in 1896, 27,727.

Brooklyn is pushing hard for a similar advance in its library facilities. A great meeting held in its Academy of Music recently to arouse enthusiasm on the project was addressed by Mr. Carnegie, Dr. Storrs, Mr. David A. Boody and others, and the project has since been kept brightly alive by discussions in Brooklyn clubs, literary associations, newspapers, etc. Frequent rousing appeals are made by reference to the magnificent Public Library of Boston with her population only half that of Brooklyn.

HUNTINGTON.

ABROAD

The British Weekly, reviewing the life of Benjamin Jowett, just issued, closes with an indictment of the man for his "course of open and flagrant immorality. . . . He was the purest of men. He was singularly free from littleness or weakness, but he was a priest of the Church of England. He signed her articles. He ministered at her altars. He was continually repeating her creeds. In these creeds he did not believe. . . . So long as this is done it is needless to talk of truth and honor in religion. . . . One often wonders why the Broad Church has perished in England, and why the High Churchmen have prospered so exceedingly. The answer will be found in these pages. The Broad Church perished simply because it ceased to be a church."

W. Robertson Nicoll, in the April Contemporary Review, says of the late Prof. Henry Drummond: "Those who had often found the road rough had looked askance at Drummond as a spoiled child of fortune, ignorant of life's real meaning. But when he was struck down in his prime, at the very hight of his happiness, when there was appointed for him, to use his own words, 'a waste of storm and tumult before he reached the shore,' it seemed as if his sufferings liberated and revealed the forces of his soul. The spectacle of his long struggle with a mortal disease was something more than impressive. Those who saw him in his illness saw that, as the physical life flickered low, the spiritual energy grew. Always gentle and considerate, he became even more careful, more tender, more thoughtful, more unselfish. He never in any way complained. His doctors found it very difficult to get him to talk of his illness. It was strange and painful, but inspiring, to see his keenness, his mental elasticity, his universal interest. Dr. Barbour says: 'I have never seen pain or weariness or the being obliged to do nothing more entirely overcome, treated, in fact, as if they were not. The end came suddenly from failure of the heart.' Those with him received only a few hours' warning of his critical condition. It was not like death. He lay on his couch in the drawing-room and passed away in his sleep, with the sun shining in and the birds singing at the open window. There was no sadness nor farewell."

Rev. Dr. J. Guinness Rogers, in the Nineteenth Century (April), says: "The great mass of English opinion on the Liberal side would be content with a settlement which emancipated Crete from Turkish despotism, and left the question of annexation to Greece to be determined by the course of events." He is prepared to give Lord Salisbury full credit for righteous purpose in his statesmanship, but wishes he were of a less compliant temper. He nevertheless asserts that Liberals are content to await the gradual development of a Cretan policy, but are not satisfied that Greece should be humiliated and British troops and vessels be made the chief instruments of that humiliation. On the other hand, The Chronicle, representing the radical Liberals, is savage in its denunciation of Lord Salisbury, says: "If blood be shed in these wild mountains, every drop of it will lie on the head of the Powers, and of Lord Salisbury in chief, because, with absolute power to force a reasonable settlement, he has weakly failed. Nothing could be simpler than to make Greece, under any propitiatory formula, the mandatory of Europe in Crete. But Greece is by the nature of her quarrel, and by the eternal laws of things, the mandatory of a Power before which emperors are naught. The right of insurrection against that enemy of the race called Turkey is one of the rights that are well called sacred. If the sultan's integrity be 'consecrated,' as we are told, by Europe, the cause of every rebel who assails it has a higher and a holier sanction, and every man who holds by Christianity or stands for freedom may well pray that not only Crete, but also Greek Macedonia and Greek Epirus and every other province that has yet the manliness to rise may win and keep its freedom."

A Russian resident in Berlin recently said, in a local journal: "Russia is a Colossus with feet of clay, and the more she grasps in her Briarean arms, the heavier the weight that is bound ultimately to crush the whole organism to the dust. Only in a land of advanced culture is it practicable to carry out such a policy as the few choice spirits of Russian diplomacy have conceived and are trying to make Russian. The very success that attends many of the movements of this policy, and which fills the breasts of outsiders with so much anxiety, is, to the intelligent Russian, the matter likewise of anxiety, but from the opposite point of view, as just suggested. In a word there is in Russia no internal development to correspond to the gigantic strides made in her extension of domain. Nay, the resources applied to her foreign schemes are withdrawn from reforms in internal administration that have become critically imperative. There is but too much probability that the day that crowns the present policy with all the success ever dreamed of will be the day that will date the beginning of a decline that may be as rapid, and even as much of a catastrophe, as the culmination was splendid."

DEACON DUDLEY'S SUNDAYS IN BOSTON

VIII.

BY ALDEN ENDECOTT

"Tomorrow, Hannah, will be the first Sunday of the month, and the young man who sits next to me at the table says we ought to go to the old Paul Revere church at the North End—Christ Church."

"Why," asked the good wife a bit sharply, for the grounds on which the boarders recommended churches were not her grounds, and she did not intend to have the deacon led astray even for a Sunday, if she could prevent it. "Why," she repeated, "for the music?"

"No, not for the music," answered the deacon, relieved. "You know, Hannah, I have always liked that young man, and this afternoon, while I was waiting for you in the sitting-room, he quite stirred my blood with the history of that old church. I don't mean Paul Revere and the lanterns, 'two if by sea,' although that is good enough, but the struggles of the little society of Church of England folks who lived about Copp's Hill fifty years and more before the Revolution. He says that there is an endowment now to support the rector, but it still has a hard time. It has always had its struggles, ever since the old days when the founders had hard work to build and maintain their church here against the disapproval of the Puritans."

"Tit for tat, I suppose," remarked Mrs. Dudley.

"I wish you could have heard that young man tell it. He seems to know all about it. He said Boston folks usually thought of it all from the Puritans' standpoint, but it did not seem to him quite fair, because the Church of England folks were honest in their way, and since they were here it was only natural they should want to worship in a church of their own."

"I have always heard that they did have the King's Chapel," interrupted Mrs. Dudley, not sympathetically.

"Yes, the young man spoke of that, too; and we might go to that in the afternoon."

So the deacon rushed his bill, as they say in the legislature, and his wise partner let it go through without opposition.

Sunday was a glorious day. It was a long way from the Back Bay to the North End, and the Dudleys took a car and got off at Salem Street. Even then they had something of a walk along the narrow old street, seeing old houses and poor, hard-working people, that told them many a tale of a half of the world which has little knowledge of how the Back Bay half lives, even prosperous boarders from the country.

The chimes were ringing a welcome to the church-goers, as they have done for 150 years. One of the old, familiar tunes was struck as the deacon and his wife passed along the street, whereupon Mrs. Dudley magnanimously remarked, "It's worth everything to hear that old tune."

As they entered the plain and ancient portals she whispered, "I wonder if it will be anything like the Advent—getting up and sitting down?"

Within the heavy inner door one glance proved that there was all the difference between the Back Bay and the North End, between the Advent and Christ Church.

"What a dear old place," she whispered, as her eye passed over the mahogany-rimmed pews, such as so many country churches now have bought from city ones discarding them for a newer fashion. The galleries on both sides, too, had a homey, familiar look, and the large windows with small panes and no stained glass. Even the farther end—she had not yet put herself on familiar terms with the word "chancel"—even the head of the church, did not look very Episcopalian, though there was a reading desk on one side and a high pulpit on the other, and the communion table was spread behind a railing.

They were early and the deacon was quite bristling with information which his table neighbor had given him about the old silver communion service, which had been presented to the church, some of it as far back as 1723 and 1744, by King George II. and the provincial governor, Shirley, and other notables before the Revolution, who were trying to help the church along. The organ in the gallery at the back and the clock in front of it, and some curious brightly colored statuettes, were also presents. The figures, which represented angel heralds blowing horns, were captured by a privateer. The deacon knew that if he could only make Hannah feel the struggles that little church had been through, she would be a good deal happier all through the meeting, or service, as he supposed he ought to call it.

Perhaps it was that, perhaps it was the homeliness of the general look, perhaps it was the familiar hymn and the clear way in which the full, rich voices of the choir sang words she knew—whatever it was, Mrs. Dudley soon felt at home in the Old North Church, as she had never believed she could feel in any Episcopal church. Then the minister—"the officiating clergyman"—seemed sort of natural, too, in spite of his gown. The sexton had said that the rector, Mr. Duane, was in Europe, but that his friend, Mr. Robert Murray of Waltham, would take his place. It seemed to her that Mr. Murray read his service "right out of the Holy Scriptures." He didn't sort of sing something along so'st one couldn't keep up, but spoke clearly and firmly, and it was a real comfort when he read a Psalm she knew, that she could say aloud, yet not be heard, every alternate verse.

"I do say," she declared afterwards, "I never heard the parable of the widow's mite when it seemed to do me more good. How he said, 'Possess your soul in patience,' and 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but not my word.' And, Jacob, do you know, I sort of felt guilty about my being so sharp set against that poor little church when Mr. Murray read that we should be thankful if we were accounted worthy to escape these things. We haven't many trials ourselves, and think what that little congregation has had. In fact, from the plain looks of all the people, I guess there are very few of them that don't know work, and pinch, too, sometimes."

"Well, there were some," responded the deacon "I wasn't sorry for. They were the visitors who sat in front of us. If ever people had it printed all over 'em that they did not come for anything but to see what they could see"— The deacon was too indignant to finish his sentence.

"Was that the reason you made such a point of getting up and sitting down every time?"

"Partly. I said to myself: 'Here's this church, and here's the people who care for it as much as we do ours in Peaceville; and I don't see as it's using them just right if I don't try to show my respects for their ways by following them as far as I can.'"

After the service, when the officiating clergyman announced the communion, he invited any member of Christ's church who might be a stranger amongst them to come to their table. The deacon looked straight ahead of him for many minutes—his wife, watching him, also impressed by the simple invitation. The first company who could find room about the chancel were administered to and returning to their places; the second knelt, and the clergyman offered them the bread and wine, with his gentle words; the third began to move forward, when the deacon gave one look at his wife, whispering, "I can't refuse that invitation," and got up. Instantly she rose also, and they took their places with the rest.

The rest of the service was a sort of dream. After the benediction they silently made their way out of the church. The old bells rang them a farewell to a tune which they used at home to the words, "I am the Way, the Truth, the Life." All the way back to the boarding house they did not speak.

In their own room, Mrs. Dudley said: "I didn't know as he meant orthodox visitors, but I guess we didn't either one of us eat or drink unworthily, Jacob."

The deacon said: "I felt so, too."

At the dinner table the deacon's young man asked them if they had waited to examine the silver and the old prayer-book and "vinegar" Bible in the vestry room, and if they had gone up in the tower to see the bells, and look out the window through which Paul Revere saw the lanterns.

The deacon said no, it went against him to treat the old church like a curiosity shop. The young man looked surprised for a moment.

"There was a great crowd, I heard, and the old things are awfully interesting, but I sort of felt it was being impertinent, myself, when I examined them with a crowd of others after service."

In the afternoon the deacon and his wife entered King's Chapel somewhat before half past three, and although there are stained glass windows there and fluted pillars with richly ornamented capitals, the old fashioned galleries made their way to the country people's hearts, but still more the Sunday school of young people in the galleries and the closing hymn they sang.

The old "square" pews, which have been replaced by the narrow "slip" pews in so many early churches (including Christ Church), have been allowed to remain in King's Chapel. They are still lined with the red satin wool brocade and, with all the rest of the interior, are kept as nearly as possible as in the old days. Some of them have only narrow seats facing each other; some have big, comfortable arm-chairs. Neither the deacon nor his wife would indulge in the chairs. They might be good old style, but they did not seem church-like. In King's Chapel everything seemed nearer the Episcopalianism of the Advent, yet the service proved to be far different as it proceeded. Scarcely anybody in the Dudleys neighborhood pretended to get up or to really kneel, so the old couple sat quietly and listened to the beautiful music (though a violin obbligato startled them somewhat) and to the clear, beautiful reading of the pastor, Rev. Howard N. Brown.

The delight of the afternoon was the sermon from the brief text, "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify God." It was a plain, straightforward talk as from one Christian to others, an appeal not to forget that the light is God's and we are the candlesticks, not to forget that this light shines by means of simple truth, of unselfishness, love for others and love for nature. It was a talk for Christians in springtime, reminding them of how unspeakably lovely the world we live in is soon to become, how it is all given us without the asking, and how by keeping near to nature's heart our light is strengthened.

"Seems to me, Hannah," said the deacon that night, "that the Lord has been very rich in his blessings to us this day."

"Yes, Jacob," said his wife, "and to think they should have come by means I have always believed were so mistaken as to be almost sinful."

SWAMI VIVEKANANDA UPON HIS NATIVE HEATH

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D. D.

A Hindu prophet is not always without honor in his own country. Swami Vivekananda has come back to India, has seen and conquered. Everywhere in southern India he has been received with more than royal acclaim. Triumphal arches have been erected; garlands innumerable have been hung upon his willing neck; his carriage has been unyoked from its horses and drawn by enthusiastic scholars and high dignitaries of the land, for is not he the great Brahman who has won the Western lands for Hinduism? Is not he the profound scholar, the eloquent orator, the astute diplomat, the master of assemblies, who, by waving his magic wand for a few months in Chicago, New York and London, has turned back the engulfing waters of Christianity, which threatened, only a few short years ago, to submerge the world—India included?

These are the ideas at least which the average Hindu seems to have imbibed, and we may be very sure that Vivekananda himself has done nothing to disabuse his countrymen of these notions. No wonder they call him "Swami" in their words, "God" Vivekananda.

But, though so exalted, this god is quite willing to be interviewed. He doubtless learned the trick when in America. Here are some choice extracts as they recently appeared in the Madras Mail.

"What was your experience of America, Swamiji?" asked the enterprising reporter.

"From first to last very good," answered Vivekananda. "With the exception of the missionaries and 'church women,' the Americans are most hospitable, kind-hearted, generous and good-natured."

Naturally the reporter desired to know something of these "exceptions" who so fall below the average American, and so he asked, "Who are these church women that you speak of, Swamiji?"

Swamiji: "When a woman tries her best to find a husband she goes to all the bathing places imaginable, and tries all sorts of tricks to catch a man. When she fails in her attempts she becomes what they call in America an 'old maid,' and joins the church. Some of them become very 'churchy.' These church women are awful fanatics. They are under the thumb of the priests there. Between them and the priests they make a hell on earth. They make a mess of religion. With the exception of these the Americans are a very good people. They loved me so much. I loved them. I felt as though I was one of them."

After sounding the Swami on the interesting subject of "church women" the reporter asked him his idea concerning the Parliament of Religions. Here is Vivekananda's opinion.

"The Parliament of Religions, as it seems to me, was intended for a 'heathen show' before the world, but it turned out the heathen got the upper hand and made it a Christian show all around. So the Parliament of Religions was a failure from a Christian standpoint. But the Chicago parliament was a tremendous success for India and Indian thought. It helped on the tide of Vedanta which is flooding the world."

Having exhausted these American church women and the Parliament of Religions, the Swami adopts the rolê of prophet when asked, "What are the prospects of the spread of your mission in England?"

"There is every prospect," he replied, with jaunty confidence. "Before ten years elapse a vast majority of the English people will be Vedantins. There is a greater prospect of this in England than in America. You see Americans make a fanfaronade of everything, which is not the case with Englishmen."

Thus having predicted the complete triumph of Brahmanism in England, and that within the short space of one decade, he goes on to give an interesting view of the English character, which, on the whole, he esteems highly, as indeed is most fitting in a loyal subject of Queen Victoria. But this further estimate he confides to the willing ear of the reporter: "John Bull is rather a thick-headed gentleman to deal with. You must turn the screw and push the idea until it reaches his brain, but once there it does not get out. . . . To my astonishment many of my friends belong to the Church of England. I learn that these missionaries who howl (against me) come from the lowest classes in England. No Englishman will mix with them. Caste is as vigorous there as it is here, and the English Churchman belongs to the class of gentlemen. Therefore I would give a word of advice to my countrymen, that is, not to take the least notice of all these vituperative missionaries, now that I have found out what they are. We have 'sized' them, as the Americans say. Non-recognition is the only attitude to assume towards them."

I might go on through many columns, quoting other choice bits from this sage of modern Brahmanism, but perhaps these are enough to show his braggadocio and deceit and his animus against missionaries and earnest Christians. This interview is surely sufficient to open the eyes of certain gullible Americans who petted and coddled him, and gave him the impression that they were so much superior to the despised missionaries and "church women" who "make a hell on earth."

That Vivekananda's return has made a deep impression upon certain portions of the Hindu community is certain. But I cannot find that the Christian community has been greatly affected by his bombastic claims. The arrival of Dr. John Henry Barrows in Madras at about the same time is a powerful antidote to Vivekananda's poison. Dr. Barrows is so uncompromising and outspoken in his defense of evangelical Christianity that he has won the hearts of all the missionaries and Christian workers. He has deeply impressed many Hindus as well, and when he leaves India he will doubtless be classed by Swami as a "low caste American," perhaps not much better than the "church women" themselves.

A PEEP INTO THE SOUTH

BY MRS. C. L. GOODELL

For the Northerner, who makes the journey to the well-known resort of Asheville, N. C., for the first time, there awaits a great surprise, for no one could be able to picture to himself the marvelous and startling experience of crossing the lofty mountains of the Blue Ridge by rail. Formerly this was accomplished after the fashion of the olden time, in a lumbering stage coach over a rough road. Now it has come to be one, not of convenience only, but of positive luxury.

There are two natural gaps or gateways of entrance through these mountains from the east. The great Southern Railway, with its magnificent Pullman cars, takes you through one of these along the course of the beautiful Swannanoa, a large and swiftly flowing river, to the western part of the State. And what a ride! Up and up, winding in and out like a thread, across dizzy chasms and around gigantic walls of solid rock; now clinging to the very edge of the mountain-side, and then over great masses of detached granite. Back and forth the train creeps, doubling on itself several times in the ascent. From one point, the track below over which the train has passed can be seen on fourteen different grades.

At last you come to the great tunnel which pierces the summit and then the descent begins. You soon reach the city of Asheville, which lies in an elevated basin and reminds you in general effect of a Swiss town. Hardly anywhere in the world is there a happier combination or greater variety of lovely scenery than just here. The hills on which the city is spread out rise up from the valleys of the French Broad and Swannanoa Rivers, 2,600 feet above the level of the sea. From the top of one of these hills 180 peaks are said to be in sight, while the city itself lies like a beautiful panorama at your feet.

Asheville is a place of immense distances, reaching out over these innumerable hills, showing a collection of beautiful country seats and public inns scattered irregularly and picturesquely over them. It claims a population of 12,000, exclusive of the throngs of visitors the year round. You see a variety of attractive private residences, stone and brick churches of various denominations, public library, State normal school, city hall and business blocks, including large and well-furnished dry goods stores. The electric street railways open up the suburbs in all directions. The streets themselves, which are well paved and lighted with electricity, center about a public square where, at all hours of the day, especially on Saturday, the market day, multitudes of men, of all grades and capacities, congregate for purposes of business and trade and barter, making it a place of lively exchange. Here in the open air they stand, surging back and forth, driving bargains or watching for a job, from the president of a bank to the colored man from the country, who has driven his cart, attached to an ox and a mule harnessed together, for ten miles to make a quarter.

The mountainous, health-giving climate of Asheville attracts the sick and the well from the North during the winter months, and from the South in the summer. Ample accommodations are provided in the large, handsome hotels and hospitable homes which open their doors, while the walks, and especially the drives, for miles about, are a source of delightful entertainment and enjoyment. Indeed, the luxury of driving is placed within easy reach of all—a four-seated carriage, or a "victoria," with driver and pair of horses, being furnished by any of the livery stables, for a three or four hours' drive, for the moderate sum of $2.00 in the morning and $2.50 in the afternoon.

Judging from the numbers you see on the streets and in the humble cabins scattered about in the outlying districts, there is a large population of colored people, some of them well-to-do, many of them poor. While they have, of course, the right of way in all public places, there is evident everywhere the unconcealed air of superiority on the part of the white people, which savors of the old system of slavery and which will probably never disappear from their territory. The servitude of the blacks still exists, in spirit, and they too often look in vain for any tenderness of disposition toward them from their white neighbors. This state of things does not conduce to the development of their best powers, but rather the contrary, while the lack of confidence in them, together with the constant resort to threats in place of kindly encouragement, tends to make of them only indifferent eye-servers instead of faithful, devoted servants. Of course there are noble exceptions to all this.

These people regard the North as the colored man's paradise, where their real friends are, and look, with a longing that is truly pathetic, for some good fortune that may chance to transport them over the line. Indeed they sometimes venture to plead with visitors from the North to take them home with them, promising to serve them faithfully all their life long. This, by the way, is an experiment which has been tried in several instances with very satisfactory results, and, if repeated to any extent, might help solve the much perplexed "servant question" in the North.

Eight out of the twenty-six churches in Asheville are colored. If you want, for once, to break away from the stiffness of some of the more conventional church services, go and give your emotional nature a little freedom in one of these churches. You will enjoy the earnest, informal talk of the preacher, and in response to his irresistible appeal at the close, you will march up in line with all the rest, and lay your offering on the table in front, after which you will find yourself in good mood to join heartily in the familiar gospel songs which ring out with characteristic melody and pathos from these simple-hearted worshipers. Sometimes these souls become so enraptured that they seem ready to "sit and sing themselves away to everlasting bliss." Not infrequently their service of a Sunday night is unconsciously prolonged a whole hour beyond the usual time for closing.

During a recent stay of four weeks in Asheville, it was interesting to learn of the various forms of Christian work undertaken and carried on along the different denominational lines. One is not long in discerning, under the exterior of society and fashion, a rich vein of self-sacrificing energy and action that savors of the true spirit of Christ. Besides the home and foreign missionary organizations which exist in most of the churches, there are also many charitable institutions, such as the Children's Home, Flower Mission, Rescue Training School, hospitals, etc., where individual workers find ample scope for benevolent effort, and in many ways give comfort and relief to the sick and needy. "The poor ye have always with you," may aptly be said concerning this city as well as of other cities scattered over our land. But just as truly can it be said of these Southern Christians, that a great company of them are "full of faith and power," and "do great wonders among the people" in the name of Christ.

Not far beyond the city limits of Asheville is George W. Vanderbilt's magnificent estate, known as "Biltmore," which is destined to become as famous as any spot in our country. His private park comprises several thousand acres of alternating hills and valleys, all under careful, scientific cultivation, adorned with artificial lakes, rustic stone bridges, a profusion of evergreen shrubbery, palms and flowers, and having 100 miles and more of smoothly graded, macadamized roads for driving. This park, with all its attractions, is freely open to the public two days in the week, and thousands of visitors avail themselves of the privilege.

Within this park, on a wide elevated plateau, commanding an extensive view of the mountains and overlooking the picturesque valley of the French Broad River, Mr. Vanderbilt has erected his immense stone castle, costing $4,000,000, and furnished it with expensive works of art from all parts of the world. His stables, dairies and propagating houses, fisheries and deer reserves are all on the same grand scale. He has also erected on this estate a beautiful stone church edifice for the use of his many employès and their families and for the people of the neighborhood. This he has dedicated as a sacred memorial to his father and his mother.

He has furnished the church with a fine organ, prayer-books and hymnals, and here he supports a professional organist, a quartet choir and chorus of thirty trained singers, and a rector who conducts service every Sabbath morning. The city of Asheville may well be proud of such a suburb as Biltmore, with all its varied attractions, so near and so available. The advantages from both a lucrative and educational standpoint can hardly be estimated.

Wilton College

If this college for German youth is 127 miles west of the Mississippi, its president, Rev. M. E. Eversz, has his home in Chicago. From him one learns that in the academy there are now 125 students, of whom forty-six speak German. English speaking students are not excluded. Nineteen German born students hope to preach the gospel. The three counties, Cedar, Scott and Muscatine, furnish a fine field for a school like this. Students have gone to this college from twelve other States. The college was removed to Wilton two years since from Crete, and since its removal has prospered greatly. The first term the number of students increased from ten to forty, and has increased since to 125. The citizens of Wilton provided the present buildings and a campus of nine acres. They gave $4,000 for repairs, and $13,500 to be paid in ten annual installments. The repairs, as is natural, cost a little more than was anticipated. To meet present emergencies $5,000 is needed. As this is the only German Congregational college in the United States, it should not be permitted to languish for lack of the small sum for which it asks. Such a college is indispensable and should be sustained. In its present distress it rests as a great burden on the heart of its self-sacrificing president.

The Seminary

The closing exercises of the seminary year began with the communion service in the seminary chapel Sunday afternoon, April 11. The sermon before the graduating class was preached in the First Church Sunday evening by Dr. Nehemiah Boynton of Detroit. It was in his best vein, and was eminently appropriate. In the morning he preached the first sermon in the new house to be occupied by the Washington Park Church. The week has been occupied with examinations, some of them written, others oral. Year by year they are becoming severer and the list of studies to which young men are required to give attention longer. Professors and examiners express themselves as satisfied with the way in which the students have this year acquitted themselves. There is no doubt as to the hard work done both on the part of the faculty and the students.

Moody Again

Not content with the services week before last, the public filled the Auditorium twice last Sunday. In the afternoon every seat was occupied by women, to whom Mr. Moody spoke with even more than his usual tenderness and effectiveness. In the evening an equally large audience of men was present. It would seem as if such evident interest in services like these were an indication of genuine Christian life.

Washington Park Church

Since Professor Mackenzie assumed the pastorate and Professor Curtiss the management of the finances, and began the canvass of the neighborhood, the prosperity and growth of this church have been assured. Sunday morning, April 11, the dedicatory exercises of what is to be, when completed, a commodious and attractive house of worship began and continued through the week. The dedicatory service, properly so called, took place Sunday afternoon, Dr. E. P. Goodwin offering the prayer. Dr. Noble and Dr. Willard Scott made addresses, and Dr. Savage, Rev. Fred. Staff and Superintendent Armstrong participated. In the evening Dr. Mackenzie preached, assisted by Rev. J. A. Adams, a former pastor. At all three services Professor Curtiss appealed for money and succeeded in raising nearly $2,300, a large sum, considering the character of the parish and the size of the church. Tuesday evening Secretary Taintor gave a free lecture on The Men of the Mayflower, with stereopticon views. Wednesday there was a special gathering for prayer, at which nearly all members of the church, the Sunday school teachers, the members of the societies of Christian Endeavor and many other Christian friends in the vicinity were present. Thursday evening was set apart for a social gathering, at which brief addresses of congratulation were made by visiting brethren. The night was exceedingly stormy, but those who ventured forth were well repaid. Friday evening there were services appropriate to the time. The new church enters a house of its own under the best auspices, and may reasonably hope in no long time to become strong and helpful.

Another Y. W. C. A. Anniversary

Monday evening the twentieth anniversary of the Y. W. C. A. organization was observed by a banquet at the home of the association on Michigan Avenue, at which such men as Drs. Henson, Withrow, Noble and Johnson were present. Judge Kohlsat, Dr. J. P. Hale, Dr. Canfield, Dr. Rubinkam and Dr. Hirst also made short addresses. The association has within a few years put up a large edifice on the avenue, where for a moderate price it furnishes a comfortable and attractive home to young women. While the atmosphere of the home is thoroughly evangelical, and the work is supported almost entirely by members of evangelical churches, its managers have not refused the assistance and sympathy of such men as Dr. Canfield of the Universalist church.

Another Bank Failure

The public was surprised to learn last week that the Globe Savings Bank had been compelled to close its doors. From investigations already made it would seem as if its 3,600 depositors will lose all that they have intrusted to its keeping. It looks as if there had been considerable dishonest handling of its funds. Its president, Mr. Spalding, as treasurer under the Altgeld rule of the State University, has, it is feared, so manipulated the funds of the institution that it will lose heavily. Some have thought that it would lose its endowment bonds as well as its deposits, and that the university would be obliged to cease its work for the remainder of the year. Mr. Spalding has turned over to the new treasurer of the university assets which at their face value would nearly equal the amount missing. Of their real value one cannot be certain. Nor is it certain that the university can retain these assets and the depositors receive nothing. The courts may have to decide. One of the worst features of the case is the fact that Governor Altgeld is mixed up in it. Indeed he seems to have compelled the trustees of the university to approve Mr. Spalding's bond which now is said to be inadequate, and to have been a borrower of the funds which Mr. Spalding received for safe keeping. At present there are a good many rumors which it is hoped will not prove true. One thing is certain, the bank has failed and the losses of innocent parties will be very large. This is the more to be regretted as savings banks have never been very popular in the West. Building societies have taken their place, and have hitherto been as sound financially as they have been popular. Some additional legislation may be required to secure their absolute safety.

The New Administration

Mayor Harrison assumed control of the city Thursday evening. There were flowers and the usual congratulations. He says he does not intend to violate any laws, or to stand in the way of any proper application of the principles of civil service. The men whom he has chosen as heads of departments are men of good standing. Just what will come of his control of the police force of the city is not yet apparent. We had hoped that this department, like the water department, would be taken out of politics. Mayor Swift's report of the work he has been able to do indicates fidelity to his pre-election promises and municipal ability of a high order. If Mr. Harrison does as well as he promises to do he will receive the support of a great many who did not vote for him, and who regarded his election as a serious misfortune. If he attempts, even under pressure, to set aside the principles of civil service, he will find the Civic Federation a much more powerful opponent than he may think. The report of the retiring mayor, Mr. Swift, was encouraging to all those who are striving to secure good government for cities. He has effected a saving of $1,800,000 on the pay rolls during his two years of office, and has given the city better service than it was receiving at his inauguration.

He has introduced the merit system, and thus taken the police out of politics; he has settled the long litigated lake front controversy, whereby the Illinois Central has already sunk its tracks and made a beautiful park possible; he has persuaded and compelled many of the railroads to elevate their tracks, and taken steps which will make this elevation universal; he has enlarged the operations of the health department and rendered them more efficient; he has increased the water supply of the city, and has provided for intercepting sewers; he has corrected abuses in the special assessment system, and while reducing the expenses of the city government has shown that the finances of the city can be successfully managed. The people will not be satisfied unless Mr. Harrison succeeds as well as his predecessor.

A General Cleaning Day

The suggestion that May 15, or some other day in that month, be taken as a day upon which private citizens shall combine with officials and clean up every alley and street in the entire city has met with a favorable response. Even if the attempt fail in some respects, it is worth while to make it. Some good will come of it.

The Birthday of a Veteran

Wednesday, April 14, Dr. D. K. Pearsons celebrated his seventy-seventh birthday. Dispatches and letters rained in upon him at Hinsdale and made him happy. Fully twenty institutions of learning, as recipients of his gifts, sent him their congratulations. The doctor is in good health and spirits and is just as ready as ever for a campaign which has no other object than putting some college on its feet. Of one thing the doctor may be sure, the congratulations which come to him are genuine. In common with them all we express our hope that he may live till he sees all the institutions in which he is taking such deep interest thoroughly established and equipped for their work. For no one of them is he more anxious than for Mt. Holyoke. To him and to the friends of the college West, the meagerness of the collections on Mary Lyon Day was disappointing.

The Presbyterians

The Western section of the Alliance of Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian system, which seeks to bring these churches into closer fellowship, met on April 15 in the Covenant Church of Chicago to discuss various matters connected with their work. Representatives were present from the Canadian church, the Presbyterian churches, North and South, the Reformed Church of America and the Reformed Church of the United States, the United Presbyterian Church, the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Church. In the evening these visiting brethren were given a banquet by the Presbyterian Ministers' Association of Chicago. FRANKLIN.

NATURE'S SECRET

BY JOSEPHINE CANNING

I know a green bank where anemones grow
And daisies and buttercups too;
And where the sweet violets open their eyes
To the color of heaven's own blue.

The apple trees pink with the blossoms of May
A fragrance distill on the air,
And breezes all gently in passing them by
Kiss softly their petals so fair.

Adown through the meadow a river flows by,
Like a ribbon its pathway is seen,
And close to its windings on either green bank
Are willows of tender hued green.

The hills in their new budding verdure look down
And smile on the valleys below,
And the bobolink sings o'er his nest in the grass
Where cowslips and pimpernels grow.

O nature, whose heart throbs in winter are stilled,
What think you of spring and its bloom?
What force has impelled you to clothe the broad earth
With beauty bright spun from your loom?

For answer we read from each sweet-scented flower,
And from the wild bird as it sings;
'Tis God in the blossoms, 'tis God in the breeze,
'Tis God in the heart of all things.

Now that the bicycle season is fairly open it is well to bear in mind that this form of exercise for women meets with the approval of physicians. That is, an organically sound woman can ride a wheel with as much impunity as a man. The tide of public opinion, too, which for many generations has debarred the gentler sex from the benefits and pleasures of physical recreation, has turned in the other direction. The rational enjoyment of tennis, rowing, golf and other outdoor pastimes is no longer the monopoly of men. The diseases of women take a front place in our social life, and statistics show that a large per cent. are functional ailments begotten of ennui and lack of opportunity to work off superfluous muscular and nervous energy. All this is corrected by a judicious use of the wheel. Sleeplessness, so-called "nerves" and those petty miseries for which the liver is made a scapegoat disappear with the fresh air inhaled and the general effects of exercise and exhilaration.

An index of the growth of working women's societies is seen in the plans for the forthcoming convention to be held in Philadelphia the last week in April. This will be the third national gathering of working girls, the first being held in New York in 1890, and the next in Boston in 1894. Among the eminent speakers will be Sir Walter Besant and Dr. Rainsford. The topics arranged for discussion cover a wide range of subjects, including Women in Factories and Workshops, Religion in the Clubs, Holiday Houses, Physical Training and Civic Work. The arrangements for social courtesies to the delegates show that artificial barriers of wealth and position are rapidly being leveled by association in the clubs. The Colonial Dames will give a reception, the Drexel Institute and School of Industrial Art will be open for inspection, and excursions are planned to points of historical interest. Women of leisure, who have frequent opportunities to attend public meetings, have no conception what an outing of this character means to a busy wage-earner.

It was a rare spring morning when April was in one of her most bewitching moods. Three ladies, mutual acquaintances, chanced to meet in an electric car bowling toward a beautiful suburb of Boston. The unrivaled splendor of the day naturally evoked enthusiastic comment. But the remarks of two of the party sounded trite and commonplace as compared with the utterance of the eldest woman. As the car climbed an eminence she began without affectation, in a low, well-modulated voice, to quote at length and comment upon a fine passage from Bryant's Monument Mountain, beginning:

> Thou who wouldst see the lovely and the wild
> Mingled in harmony on nature's face,
> Ascend our rocky mountains. Let thy foot
> Fail not with weariness, for on their tops
> The beauty and the majesty of earth,
> Spread wide beneath, shall make thee to forget
> The steep and toilsome way.

Her genuine appreciation of the poet's sentiment and her own evident love of nature charmed her listeners, making one, at least, feel that for true culture and real familiarity with the choicest literature the women of a past generation often excel their younger and college-bred sisters.

BY THE PROVIDENCE EXPRESS

BY JOHN PRESTON TRUE

Joe Dent knocked the ashes from his pipe. The iron pillar rang like a bell under the stroke, and a tiny echo whispered back from the wall and was lost in the low, placid hissing of the engine.

Joe had no right to be smoking in that room, where he was assistant engineer in the basement of a huge department store. But today he felt utterly reckless, and cared no more for regulations than a tramp. What a hash he had made of things, to be sure! And how all his past mistakes came trooping back and hedged him in, until they stood too thickly for a thought to escape him without their leave. It gave him a grim sort of satisfaction just to look them over, each being one more proof to back up his own opinion of himself against himself. And he was but a young fellow, too!

Too young for his place, the mighty "head of the house" had thought at first; but he liked young men and had long since learned to take their measure, and Joe had swung through the searching examination as though he had been fed on dynamics and steam gauges from his cradle, instead of having just graduated from a stationary engine on a farm. So now he was here watching the needle on the indicator, the glow of the furnace on the floor, the hight of the water column in the guarded glass tube; and the farm—was many a mile away. Had it paid? Yes, it had! he told himself, savagely. There are some things that no man will ever stand. And Lou had told him—had told him—what was it? That she had married beneath her, and that he had married her for the farm. He writhed at the thought even now.

"Curse the farm! It was she that I loved, not a lot of barns and cattle," he roared, then sank back on his stool and covered his face. It was a bitter thing to face.

Then he began to make excuses for her to himself. She was but a girl, not eighteen. Too young to marry, they had said, the wiseheads! Impulsive and untrained, and left alone in the world. Why had he not been more patient with her, and tried to do the things which seemed so all-important to her, although so trifling to him? He could see now that each chance ignored had been the gentle sliding of a quicksand through a barrier, until at last enough had passed to carry all before it in an overwhelming rush that had swept away their happiness forever—

"Dinner, Joe."

It was his superior, returned from his own lunch, and Joe rose slowly, wearily, and put on his coat. A dozen light-hearted, small salesgirls were fluttering into the stockroom beyond with their own luncheons, and hailed him with a shout in the free, "all-of-a family" way customary among such.

"Joe! come and turn this box over!"

"Joe! please lend me your knife to cut this knot."

"Joe! I want you, too!" in four or five different directions at once as he passed through the room. But his face was so full of gloom as he silently lent those that needed it a helping hand that a shadow fell on them which lasted till long after the hour was over. What could it mean? And each small heart gave a little throb of fear and pity, for with them but one outlook could give them such a mien—their sword of Damocles, "discharge." And what would they do now without Joe?

Out into the hurly-burly and roar of the streets plunged the engineer. It might help him to forget. The rumble swept up one great artery of trade and met at right angles another in a swirl of battle thunder. Cabs, lumbering drays, crashing, clanging electric cars and the seething mob of hurrying souls, that filtered through the crossways and in and out among the teams as though reckless of life—this was what he sought, and he let himself drift with the crowd. But man does not hang sorrow on a nail when he dons his hat for an outing. He takes it with him as he would a watch, and forever finds himself referring to it. As to happiness—what had become of his?

Joe stopped short, bewildered by the words and the resulting shout of laughter from many voices. Unconsciously he had entered a cross street, and was opposite an auction room, in the heart of which was an eager, laughing crowd. Their gayety attracted him, and he shouldered straight in, as though that had been his real destination. Perhaps it had under fate's kindly guiding hand.

It was one of those semi-annual affairs that brighten the monotone of the salesman's life, the disposal of unclaimed express parcels. A great heap of them lay behind a counter, and before it pressed a rough, good-naturedly excited throng, with here and there an unkempt, earnest-eyed little Jew, whose highest bid invariably was "Thirty shents!" For these packages were always sold unopened, and it was the unwritten law that the buyer should open his package then and there for the joy of the losing bidders. Up went a valise on the counter. "How much for this?" and swift came the bids in ridiculously small gains; five cents, ten cents, sold—for twenty-one cents to the fat man in the corner. A knife forces the lock in a twinkling. Treasures? That depends on individual estimation. Three old bricks and a wad of newspapers are revealed, and the crowd guys the buyer, who enjoys it as much as they. A box! A Jew wriggles to the front, eyes it keenly, bids up to his limit—"thirty shents"—and gets it. He is disposed to shoulder it and make off, but the bystanders won't hear to that. Up comes a hatchet. Smash! and a lot of samples of shoes appear. Isaac grins happily and is cheered for his luck. Several small parcels bring quite high prices, as more likely to contain valuables. One box is loaded with last year's almanacs, advertising a patent medicine, which the laughing buyer promptly distributes by pelting the heads of the men on the floor below him with this literature of a bygone day, till some one pulls him and his box off the bench together to make room for another.

"Now, gentlemen!" cried the auctioneer, "here is the chance of a lifetime! This great flat box evidently contains a picture; perhaps an old master, perhaps a family portrait of your ancestors who came over in the ark. You can hang it up in your hall and tell your friends to note the resemblance to the owner. Five I am offered, ten I am offered, shall I have fifteen?" and away up went the bids, for this undoubtedly was a prize of value; and when at twenty-five dollars it was taken by a man with a white waistcoat and a big seal to his watchchain, his friends congratulated him while the cover was being pried open with special care. A pause, a craning of necks, then a yell of delighted laughter rang out that echoed clearly from the house across the street, while the new owner gazed in blank stupefaction at his acquisition. Peal on peal of merriment rang out and men lay down and rolled and shook at the disclosure. For there, neatly packed, was a stuffed, double-headed calf, consigned vainly to some unappreciative freak museum by a disappointed granger.

"What did I tell you, gentlemen, about its being a family portrait?" cried the salesman, grinning, and again the crowd shouted and guyed the buyer. "You can trust me every time, gentlemen; trust me all in all or not at all, as the poet says. Now, here's another prize. How much for this, no doubt a jewel case?" and the fun went on.

Presently, a small, box-like parcel was put up.

"Here, gentlemen, is another jewel box. It is light"—tossing it—"so it can't be a wedding cake like the last lot, in which I was unfortunately mistaken. Year old cake is a little dry, brother, ain't it? Better buy a fresh lot tomorrow and remember me when the cards are out," and the red-faced teamster, who had made that unlucky purchase, turned all sorts of colors to the huge delight of his unmerciful fellows. "How much?"

It did look like something of value, that oblong little box, and bids came fast and in earnest. Men get reckless at times under such enthusiasms, and it was a long price indeed that carried off the treasure. Eager eyes awaited the unfolding. Paper after paper fell, string after string went writhing down before the box itself was shown. Then slowly, reverently, the rough man lifted from its bed of protecting cotton wool the treasure which had been packed so carefully with tender, loving hands a year ago and sent on its unended mission. Torn, it was, with briers. Torn and scratched, rubbed through to the white—only a worn-out, tiny baby shoe!

Where was the guying, the laughter? Not a sound escaped from the crowd. For long, long seconds silence fell like a mist upon them, and like a mist things seemed to each man there for those long seconds dim and indistinct. What little feet had stumbled in that bit of leather and its mate a year ago, and where were they now? Still sturdier and more wearing, or on a heavenly pavement? Who could say? As the buyer slowly turned the slipper over a bit of paper with faded writing on it, blotted and stained, fluttered out and silted downward. Why was it stained? Were they tears that made those blurs, and why?

Hesitatingly the man picked up the paper and began to read to the silent men:

> Dear Joe: O Joe, come back to me. I had only you and Sammy to love. I never knew how much I loved you till you'd gone, and now the doctor says—O Joe, he says I shall not have Sammy much longer. Come back before—

There was a struggle, a shoving, a hoarse voice that cried harshly, "Let me through!" and choked and ceased; then a man burst through them and leaped upon the counter.

"Give me that! It's mine!"

Letter and shoe were wrenched from the holder's hands. An unheeded, uncounted wad of crumpled bills was thrust into them in return. Then with a wild, desperate gesture and swing of his arm the man plunged straight down as though into a tossing sea, and plowed his way resistlessly toward the door.

Those that were left looked at one another silently. Those that were hurt in that mad rush did not know it, or if they did made no complaint. Then, as with one accord, they turned to the salesman, motionless, expectant. And he, glancing at the merchandise behind him, swept a long look over their heads at the patch of blue sky visible through the doorway, and said, quietly, "Gentlemen, the sale is over for this day."

Through the doorway, out into the hurly-burly, yet under the blue sky, the throng as quietly melted away.

WHEN KING OSCAR WAS PRINCE

BY JANET SANDERSON

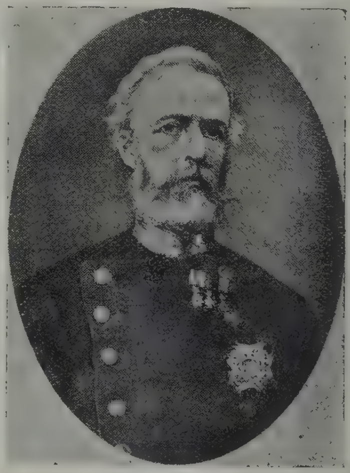
King Oscar of Sweden and Norway was not born of a long line of kings. It was only by accident that a simple, obscure burgher's family of the Pyrenees came to be the rulers of the finest kingdom in northern Europe.

Away in southern France, in a small gray house of one story, No. 6 Rue de Tran, in the lovely town of Paw Marshal, Bernadotte was born in 1764. He quitted his native town in 1780 as a drummer boy in the Regiment Royal de la Marine, and later in 1810 was adopted by the childless Charles XIII. of Sweden, and in 1818 was made king, the first Bernadotte sovereign. He was succeeded by his son Oscar I. and he in turn by his son Charles XV., who, dying childless, left the throne to his brother, Oscar II. (the subject of our sketch) in 1872. All their reigns, from 1818 to the present day, have been reigns of peace and prosperity.

When the little Oscar was born he was so far away from the throne, his grandfather being king, his father Crown Prince and the two older brothers having nearer claim, it was not thought needful to educate him for a ruler and he was allowed to carry out his one wish—to be a sailor. When the little fellow was eleven years old he entered the Swedish navy and, like any common midshipman, worked at all duties, passing from one grade to another till he was promoted to lieutenant, and showing that thoroughness and application in his duties which he has manifested so clearly in later life. He was a true lover of the sea and even while attending the University of Upsala he never abandoned his naval pursuits, and in time gained the rank of admiral.

The hand of the prince who could guide the ship so skillfully could also wield the pen gracefully, for in a competition work written at the instigation of the Swedish Academy of Science he bore away the prize for his poem, Memories of the Swedish Fleet, sent in anonymously. After his university days he finished his military studies, then turned again to naval life, visiting many lands and the courts of Europe.

While at the little court of Wied, as guest at the castle of Monrepos, he met and loved the Princess Sophia, "his angel bright and good," as he calls her in his poem, Monrepos, and when he was twenty-one years old he took her as his bride to his northern home. It was a true love marriage, for a beautiful family life distinguishes the court of the Bernadottes, where political marriages are not the rule. So we find the prince and princess happy in their quiet home, happier still when the babies came to delight the home nest.



KING OSCAR OF SWEDEN

The father was busy with his scientific studies, full of plans for the development of his country's navy. Everything pertaining to the sea naturally claimed his interest. He encouraged all Arctic explorations and a land discovered by his explorers has been named Prince Oscar's Land. His leisure hours were occupied with music, art and literature. It was then he wrote his drama, Castle Kronberg, in French, and which is often acted in Sweden and other countries.

His literary and artistic talents are of high order and he is a poet of taste. He knows many languages and translated Goethe's Torquato Tasso into the Swedish, which earned him his election as member of the Frankfort Academy of Sciences. It was gracefully dedicated to his wife, Sophia, telling how Leonora had been to Tasso what she had been to him—the love, the inspirer, the crowning happiness of his existence. His love of history led him to write a memoir of Charles XII. which is considered a valuable work. His poems are all inspired by a keen love of nature; his sailor life had awakened his powers of observation and made him familiar with nature in all her moods, and these, with his simple and real piety, are reflected in his verse. One of his most charming poems is called In My Home, where we get a peep into the ideal family life of this poet-prince.

The home to which he refers is his favorite castle in the sound of Helsingborg, Sofiero; he named it in compliment to his wife. It is a collection of five poems describing what may be seen from the various windows of Sofiero. "A few square panes of glass," he sings, "but how many pictures it affords me!" He then describes the view and skillfully weaves in the old, strange sagas of Sweden's past, till the poem forms a perfect series of pictures of Sweden's story.

"Many a window in my home remains unclosed," he writes, "for I love to feel the summer breezes. I love to feel the sky my roof. From far the vaporous sea wind fans my brow. Here is the room in which I dwell myself. Enter it, guest, from out the breezy balcony."

As host he leads his guest from room to room, always singing a song from the window. At last he reaches those in which his fair hostess dwells.

"These," he sings, "are her favorite rooms; here flowers are bathed in sunshine. There is no sweeter freehold than this that she has chosen for herself. An awning covers the veranda, whence resting our eyes look over the ocean spread beyond. And round about is room for children's sports—to learn to play, also to slumber—ever near the mother, for such is our custom.

"Above all is my small treasure-house of books that has the view I speak of, and room is here besides for many a faithful friend, a dear acquaintance. Then, tell me, could I desire a larger house, more brilliant rooms? My bed stands peacefully under a peaceful roof, my days are filled with art, science and poesy and day by day I drink rich draughts of nectar from the balmy forest airs, from ocean's wave."

Prince Oscar is an excellent musician and able critic, and his speeches in the Musical Academy have been collected into a volume. He treats music not as an abstract art separate from all other human endeavors, but as a part of the grand whole of the intellectual life and reflecting with other sciences the spiritual character of the people among which it takes birth. The main dogma of his musical creed is that nature is inseparable from harmony. When God spoke, "Let there be light," he created at the same time with the outer world of harmony the world of sound.

Even in the happiness of his home life we find him yearning at times for the sea. He was fond of visiting England and in 1871 he visited the great international exhibition, where he took great pains to explain the model Swedish school to a member of Parliament, who said he did it as fully as a schoolmaster would have done and adds: "I never saw so rich and varied an amount of educational appliances of every kind. I found the prince a most interesting instructor and could not sufficiently admire his perfect courtesy or the goodness which placed his companions at their ease and on a level with himself. If I do not mistake he will prove a benevolent and enlightened ruler, for he is the able and enlightened promoter of education, industry, art and all that can adorn a country."

But the time had come when Oscar must exchange the happy days of the quiet life of a prince for the uneasy honors of a kingly crown, which descended on his head in 1872 when he ascended the dual throne of Sweden and Norway. King Oscar, in his proclamation, said: "My motto will be the welfare of both peoples. It will be the expression of my ardent affection for both nations united by my great ancestor. Their prosperity will always be present to my mind as the highest aim of my endeavors." He accepted the post as his duty and for twenty-five years has he conscientiously fulfilled what he then undertook.

FOR VANITY'S SAKE

BY BERTHA GERNEAUX DAVIS

He was a happy and gay little singer,
  With lyrics of summer pent up in his throat.
He sang from the dawn till the sunset, but always
  He kept for the evening his tenderest note.

Then, when the little gold stars were twinkling,
  He flew to the brim of his brown, woven nest,
And twittered soft nothings, received sleepy answers,
  That made a glad quiver creep into his breast

And ruffle his fuzzy red feathers. There surely
  Was never a little bird gladder than he.
No other nest with so downy a lining
  Was ever more cozily moored in a tree.

The air of the forest is heavy with fragrance,
  As gay-tinted flowers their petals uncurl;
But two flashing wings that God colored as brightly
  Are rigid and still—for the whim of a girl.

The little brook catches its breath as it passes,
  A shadow lies dark on the woods' brooding face—
A bit of God's music and sunshine gone from them—
  Fettered by ribbons and meshes of lace.

A full-throated chorus, yet summer is grieving
  Over the songs that will never be heard—
Locked in a small, stiffened breast. O, I wonder
  What God is thinking, you poor little bird!

UNCONSCIOUS CHARACTER

In a thoughtful essay by Rev. W. J. Dawson in the Sunday Magazine, he says, concerning the parable of the last judgment:

> May it not be said that the conscious good and evil that we do is slight compared with the unconscious? Goodness in a man or woman is not so much a quality as an atmosphere. It is not so much by this or that isolated act we judge a man good, but by the total impression which he makes upon us. I may do many generous deeds and utter many noble words, but if I am not penetrated by the power of goodness I cannot make a good impression upon others. If I am really good, I am probably doing most good when I am conscious of doing least, and am most helpful when I am making no formal effort to be helpful. Even if we narrow this suggestion down to the barest literalism, is it not true that many of our formal acts of benevolence and philanthropy do not touch the right people, and are administered in the wrong way? But kindness never fails. The best work we accomplish for others may have nothing whatever to do with money; it may be in the glance, the smile, the unconsidered elements of human friendliness, which are better than bread to the hungry or water to the thirsty. In the ends of the earth that smile is remembered, that word is cherished, and men will go down into the ways of the dead with the warmth of that friendly hand pressure still felt on the palms that buffet their way through the waters of the river that has no bridge.

It is a fatal delusion to imagine that the arts of life, which only enlarge its resources, have any necessary tendency to improve its spirit; or that the completest acquaintance with science affords any guarantee of higher goodness. No laboratory can neutralize the poison of the passion, or find a crucible to make the hard nucleus of the heart flow down; no observatory can show us a new constellation of the virtues, correct the aberration of life's true light, or deepen any heavens but those of space.—Dr. James Martineau.

Closet and Altar

Your life needs days of retirement, when it shuts the gates upon the noisy whirl of action and is alone with God.

It is because the spirit of the Old Testament says "Go," and the spirit of the New says "Come," that we know that God has been upon the earth.—Gerald S. Lee.

Gladness be with thee, Helper of the World!
I think this is the authentic sign and seal
Of Godship, that it ever waxes glad,
And more glad, until gladness blossoms, bursts
Into a rage to suffer for mankind,
And recommence at sorrow.

What is it that can convert the complaints of mankind into a song of triumph? I know of nothing but the old, old story of the death and resurrection and ascension of our Lord, impressed on us by the Holy Spirit. The assurance of that self-sacrificing love, which has sounded the depths of human misery and sin and has not been overcome by them, is supreme in God's universe, and destined to complete dominion.—W. H. Freemantle.

Wherein lies the personal power of the Lord Jesus to bind human hearts to him in devoted love and heroic service? In this, that he realized his own ideal. He was indeed perfect as God is perfect, and in being this he left all his disciples, even such an one as St. Paul, hopelessly behind. But the divine loftiness of his character does not remove him beyond reach of our sympathy. We do not lose interest in him because he is so much better than we are. On the contrary, it is by his excellence that he draws us. He is to our hearts the imitable inimitable, holding us at once by aspiration and by admiration.—A. B. Bruce.

Faith is a grasping of almighty power;
The hand of man laid on the arm of God—
The grand and blessed hour
In which the things impossible to me
Become the possible, O Lord, through thee.
—A. E. Hamilton.

Christ, who dost bid me not to let my heart be troubled, I believe in God and in thee. Let thy joy be in me, and let it be fulfilled. Fulfilled in the presence of failure if thou didst send the failure, and my own folly did not invite it; fulfilled in sickness, if the great Physician bestows the sickness in order to heal me; fulfilled in loneliness, if the solitude is crowded with thee; fulfilled even in death, when death is the shadow of thy light. Wherever I turn my weeping eyes thy loving face is a tender reproach. I mourn over my sins in such wise that the mourning is an added sin. I grieve at my poor service of God and of man, and that grief hinders my service. I sorrow at my paltry growth—a growth that sorrow dwarfs and joy enlarges. Blessed Lord, who dost die in my deaths, take me into thy resurrection life. I will forget failure and gloom; I will forget duty, even the duty of joy; and I will learn privilege. Speed me on thy errands so swiftly that I shall have no time for moodiness. Take me into thy joy so completely that I shall not even consider whether I am joyful. And all through no grace of my own, but out of thy love which has promised and never failed. Amen.

KNOWING HOW IT IS YOURSELF

BY KATE UPSON CLARK

Every one is supposed to know in these modern days that an object lesson is the only true method of teaching. In a recent novel the heroine is asked why she hesitated to do a certain act, when she knew to begin with that it was right.

"Yes," replied the heroine, "I knew that it was right, but I have only just now felt that it was."

The object lesson, especially when we ourselves furnish the objects in our own persons, makes us feel a truth.

Said a lady who recently sprained her ankle, "I never realized before how hard it was to be 'laid up,' to have to mount a pair of crutches in order to get something from the other side of the room, to be unable to join in excursions and rides. I shall always be more tender hereafter to the lame and disabled."

We may have been surprised to hear others lamenting, perhaps whimsically, but always more or less earnestly, over the first white hairs or wrinkles, or incipient baldness. Such things are so common and so inevitable that we may have scorned those who grumble at them. But when our turn comes to have the same experiences we have an inkling of their state of mind.

It is not in vogue nowadays to try to explain the phenomena of everyday life after the old-fashioned plan of "Providence." We are told by the theologians that there are no signs of attempted consistency or purpose in the affairs of the world, except on the largest scale and counting by ages; and that it is silly to try to find proofs of God's intervention in the trifles of everyday life. But surely we may cling to the doctrine of the perfection of character by discipline; and it is plain to most of us that a providential purpose of illness is to make us more sympathetic with those who are ill.

"It is singular," sighed a mother, as she languished under the indisposition which had confined her to her bed for the first time in many years, "it is singular that those children should not have come in to see me before they went off to the tennis-court. They might remember to ask me, I should think, whether I wanted anything." Or, again, "It is strange that they do not inquire whether I do not feel the need of some amusement. They might offer to read to me or play some little game with me."

"But still," she reflected further, "how should they know the way an invalid feels? We have never had an invalid in the family, they have never been sick in bed a single day themselves. They have almost never seen an invalid. As everybody who has brought up children knows, they almost never acquire any ideas of duty or courtesy except by explicit and line-upon line instruction. It has never occurred to me to instruct them regarding the care of the sick, so I must not blame them too much."

She reflected with a pang that they would probably soon learn by hard experience (with which she proposed to mingle a liberal leaven of precept) how lonely and miserable and hungry for petting the sick feel. Indeed, it seems as though a single pang in our own bodies were more effective than even the love of Christ in the heart in producing that keen sympathy with the sick and suffering which should be a part of every well-rounded character.

CULTIVATING A HUSBAND

BY MARY F. BUTTS

"I wouldn't think of that side of him," said Grandmother Dorcas.

"What do you mean?" asked the granddaughter, wiping away the tears that were overflowing her sweet brown eyes.

"When I married grandfather," replied the fair-faced old lady, letting her knitting drop into her lap, "I fairly idolized him. I didn't dream that there was any side to him but the loving, gentle, tender side that he showed when he was courting me. But I soon found out that a man isn't all 'sugar an' spice an' all that's nice,' as the nursery rhyme has it. Why child, it isn't natural. Well, I had a few crying spells and then I called up my common sense. I said to myself, 'If I want a good husband I must make the most of what is already good in him and change the rest if I can; if not, ignore it.' Why, my dear, you would think I had lost my wits if I stood over my damask roses quarreling with the thorns, instead of enjoying their prettiness and their sweetness, and being careful not to get pierced. There's a rough side to most men, and there's no use crying over it. Now, my dear, just remember this rule and act upon it, and I'll guarantee you a happy married life. Never allow yourself to think over your husband's faults, not for one minute. When you think of him look only at the kind, noble, tender side; that is to say, look at the character blossoms and not at the thorns. In this way you will be of immense help in his development in all manly qualities; you will be to him as sunshine instead of fog and mist and rain."

"I know you are right," said the young wife, whose face had brightened to its usual pleasantness, "but I am afraid that I shall often fail, no matter what good resolutions I make. If I could keep you with me always perhaps I could succeed."

"'If any one lack wisdom let him ask of God, who giveth liberally and upbraideth not,'" was the wise reply.

35. CHARADE

(Partly Phonetic.)

Jack worships Blanche, a damsel fair.
From head of FIRST to FIRST, no part
But to his transport lends its share.
In short, she's bagged the youngster's heart.

Where she goes he has still been near,
As if in FIRST; and though the two
Are sundered now, Blanche need not fear
But Jack, beyond her LAST, is true.

Though forced to flit from place to place,
He sends a daily TOTAL home;
He hastes as if he ran a race,
And vows, once back, no more he'll roam.

E. H. LOUD.

A poor man is better than a *. 8. Sir, thou hast nothing to * with. And when he was in the gate of Benjamin a captain of the * was there. DOROTHEA.

37. ENIGMA

Always in evil, missed in what is fair,
With early flowers I bear a double part,
Of falling leaves the golden glory share,
The lily pale I clasp, denied her heart.

In howling blasts I come, with hail draw near,
And sleet, flash forth with lightnings, rend in two
The cloud, lie in the clear blue asleep; fear
I know not, to the pole as needle true.

I am in exile, yet in every place;
The lake, the hill, the vale, give me a home.
All lands I touch, win in my flight no race,
But best with me is blest where'er I roam.

BEAUTEMPS.

38. DECAPITATION

Coy maiden, with the ringlets fair,
So loath with any charms to part,
Yet thou wilt surely let me share
A FIRST, so kindly is thy heart.

Still, if thou wilt not trust me near,
Then I a furtive NEXT or two
Am bound to try, although I fear
That I may risk thy friendship true.

And yet I'll pledge, in every place—
Both near at hand and far from home—
My LAST, to cheer thy life-long race
Wherever thou mayst choose to roam.

NILLOR.

39. A PLEASANT PLOT

(The omitted words name two well-known books.)

His (1)  thought, "If all is fair
In love and war, I'll play (I) part
Of fairy helper, and my share,
When he shall win the maiden's heart,
Shall be, (2) * bliss to hover near (There's never 'room enough for two'),
And all that (II) to fear
I'll soon remove, since he is true.
A (3)  for a dwelling place,
With love's sweet (III) , makes a home;
In theirs some day I'll end my race,
Contented nevermore to roam."

The Conversation Corner

YOU will use the "sign of the Corner," I know, as quick as you see this page, to ask what new cat is on exhibition now! It is not new; it is the same cat we had last week—Christopher Columbus of Pelham Manor, L. I. I did not think, when I sent his photograph to the Corner, that I should make his personal acquaintance so soon. But while off for a few days' outing I found that I had a half day free in New York, and knew that a visit to two Corner children and their pets would be far better than all the sights of the great metropolis! "Papa's pocket" was not a "dead letter office" that day, for my card of inquiry scarcely had time to reach the place when his clerk found me out in New York with a favorable answer.

When I stepped off the (Harlem River) cars at Pelham Manor, there was Jean C. on the platform, David in the carriage and "Tag" running along behind! We had a delightful ride; the Long Island Sound was near, and, although we did not see any "Cat Island," as suggested last week, Christopher C. could have almost jumped over to Glen Island, where you remember we visited four years ago, and where he would have found a Zoo full of his fellow-animals from the Old World and the New. At the children's pleasant home I saw the "twin of Bonnie Joli" himself, and learned that he had now "got used" to Tag, for I found in Jennie's album the photograph, representing him in the act of kissing the cat, who seems to make no objection! Outside was the great flat rock, on which last week's picture was taken, an apple tree in which we all found seats, the barn with its pets—and everything to make life happy!

Over in Jersey I saw a famous parrot who could not only ring the usual changes on "pretty Polly," but could spell b-o-y, boy, as plainly as you can; also a specially intelligent dog, who would pretend to be asleep, to say his prayers, or to "go to his hotel," with equal promptness and facility. When the brakeman sung out, "Next station, Passaic," I remembered our little representative there, Richard P., and had time to leave him a Corner card. I got out at Patterson to post another and the telegraph boy on the platform told me he knew the Hobart boy (of whom the Corner Scrapbook had an interesting notice last week), but when I asked about his electrical acquirements the train started on. Finally, I walked a mile or two on Sunday to hear Dr. Bradford preach at Montclair. I wish Deacon Dudley could have been there and reported his sermon on the Golden Rule! Both he and Mrs. Dudley would have liked it all, especially when he said, "What business have embezzlers and impure men to sit in the place of legislation? A bad man cannot make a good ruler."

On my return trip I crossed the entire State of Connecticut, from the southwest corner to the northeast corner, and thought of Corner members in almost every town we passed—Norwalk, Danbury, Waterbury, New Britain, Hartford, Coventry, Pomfret, etc. Spending a day in a quiet, pleasant old town among the western hills, I heard curious names of school districts—Obtuse, Whiskaneer, Pokano. The first two I supposed to have been named from some specially stupid or intemperate residents of olden time, but was told that they were of Indian origin, although, doubtless, corrupted. I suppose Dr. Trumbull could explain their meaning. The pastor pointed out, with proper pride, far away through the trees in one of the districts, the birthplace of the editor in-chief of The Congregationalist. Although he removed from the town when a small boy, the village merchant remembered him and sent greetings—which the editor will consider as delivered when he reads this in proof!

In the course of my journey, I stumbled into two schools, about as different as possibly could be. One was in a hill-town of Connecticut, where twenty young boys are kept through the school year. They only learn the ordinary English branches in the schoolroom, but outside the schoolroom and school hours they are taught how to spend their time usefully and happily, and manage all their matters on strict business and moral principles. They receive a certain small allowance every week, of which they are to keep a most exact account in their little books. They can add to their income—and evidently to their happiness—by various kinds of work, for which they receive a small sum, perhaps three or five cents per hour. On the piazza was hung a blank form of work report, which I copied:

F. Woodman: Oct. 5, 1896. Began, 3.15; ended, 4 00; total, 45 m.; pumping laundry tank. Discounts: No name, no count; no date, 10 off; wrong date, 20 off; wrong total, no count; wrong spelling, 10 off; error in punctuation, 5 off; error in capitals, 5 off.

The rocky hillside connected with the school has been made into a playground by them, with a fine toboggan slide in the midst. Some boys collect stones and pound them up for road building. A favorite job is to collect brush, cut it up fine and press it in a curious "brush-crusher," tying it in bundles for use in the schoolrooms. The day I was there two jobs were on hand—charring some posts to put in the ground as supports for a piazza extension and the building of a "back-stop" on the ball-ground. It was interesting to note how much the boys liked to work under these conditions. Perfect truthfulness and perfect honesty towards one another and the teachers are taught as the only natural and proper way of living. If a boy leaves his apples on the piazza when he goes into school, he invariably finds them there when he comes out. What a generation of business men we should have if all boys were trained to be thoroughly honest and truthful in little things! I do not suppose many of our Corner boys will leave their good homes for such a school, but there may be some hints for them where they are in this description.

The other school was in a Rhode Island city. Hearing children's singing in a fine, new convent I ventured in, and asked if I could hear them. After a while the mother-superior came and very courteously took me around to the various rooms, there being six hundred scholars in all. They had special training in music, and sang hymns of simple praise to God very finely. At my request they all joined heartily in singing America, rising as they sang. There was a roomful of kindergartners, and they sang, too. When a catechism of questions was asked them—the name of the priest of the parish, the bishop of the diocese, and various other things—a new boy, wandering around the floor, was taken by one of the sisters and given a nickel. When the question was asked, "How many senses have you?" and the children all said "five," the little fellow innocently held up his nickel, as his part of the answer!

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK

The Ohio Lady's Query. This was in the C. S. B. of March 25, and asked for the verses her father and mother used to sing fifty years ago. That one note of the nightingale brought back a concord of melodious echoes from old folks—and their children—far and near. One came, in fact, from Concord (N. H.), one from Grand Isle, Vt., one from Wisconsin, others from Attleboro, Worcester, Newburyport, Whitinsville and Lee, Mass., Atkinson and Keene, N. H., etc. (One has no place, and another, which I would like to print, is unsigned. O that correspondents would learn that our rule is like that of the Connecticut school in the accompanying Corner, "no name, no count"!)

HENNIKER, N. H.

Dear Mr. Martin: This beautiful little idyl used to charm me, some sixty or more years ago, in my schoolgirl days, and has often of late been running in my head. I am most happy to respond to the call for it. Somebody else may get the start of me. I think it was in the old English Reader, which we were using as a reading-book in the Old Granite State at that time. MRS. C.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

Dear Sir: I noticed the request for the old poem commencing,

> The nightingale, which all day long
> Cheered the village with its song, and spoke of it to my father. He commenced to repeat it, and gradually the whole thing came back to him. He had not thought of it for many years, and was pleased to think he could remember it. MISS P.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.

. . . A few years since my mother, now gone to her heavenly home, was revisiting her childhood's home in northern New York. She and an older sister were one day recalling scenes and sayings of long ago, and my aunt repeated the lines asked for, and they were written down from her lips. MISS B.

FINDLAY, O.

Dear Mr. Martin: Please tell that Ohio lady that "The Nightingale and the Glow-worm" was written by Cowper and printed in the English Reader. I went straight to our "top shelf," and took down the book and made a copy for the lady. When I was a "wee tot" my father read the poem to me one day. I thought it was so "boo'ful" I asked him to read it again and again, and I was able in a short time to repeat every word of it. E. M. S.

I find the poem on page 194 of my "English Reader." It is contained in the full edition of Cowper's poems, and also in Bryant's Library of Poetry and Song, but the latter omits the twelve closing lines of "moral." The correspondence shows the value of reading in youth a few pieces over and over again, as they used to do in the old time when, happily, books were more scarce than now—such pieces remain till old age to cheer the memory with their song!

Lesson for May 2 Acts 13: 1-13

PAUL BEGINS HIS FIRST MISSIONARY JOURNEY

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

A new chapter in the history of the primitive church begins here. It is sixteen years since Jesus told his disciples that they should be witnesses unto him in Jerusalem and in all Judæa, and in Samaria and unto the uttermost parts of the earth. We have already traced the fulfillment of this prophecy to the last and greatest movement. Antioch became the second great starting point to "the uttermost parts of the earth." The steps by which that city became the head waters of the river of life for the nations were these:

1. A new revelation to the church. It may have been eight or nine years since the first messengers of the gospel came to Antioch. The 300 miles between it and Jerusalem were a greater distance, when we consider the means of communication then existing, than that between New York and London now. Tidings from one city to the other were far less frequent. The gospel was first preached at Antioch by foreign Jews. It was soon extended to Gentiles. The church had grown in numbers, was united and earnest. It had a number of ministers and teachers, who sought for larger service than the limits of their city, great and influential as it was, afforded. The whole church, under their leadership, made a business of seeking the will of God. Public meetings were held, special prayer offered, and the people became so intensely in earnest that they fasted as they prayed. Fasting is not commanded in the Christian Church, but it is natural that when desire becomes absorbing for some special gift from God physical hunger should be repressed while mind and heart lay hold on God in prayer. It is evident that the church in Antioch was profoundly moved and felt that a great work was before it.

The Holy Spirit spoke to this praying church through its prophets and teachers, as he had spoken through Amos, Isaiah and Jeremiah. The voice of a prophet is not always the voice of the Spirit. But its genuineness may be assured by the response of devout hearers united in purpose and in inquiry as to the way to fulfill his will. The Holy Spirit speaks now to those who seek his guidance, always in harmony with what he has said before and what Christ has taught. His commands are coincident with the providences which have opened the way for the gospel in every land. The work of foreign missions was begun by the Holy Spirit, and is continued in his church by him.

2. The church obedient to the revelation. The work of foreign missions was laid on the church by Christ himself [Matt. 28: 18-20]. His teaching was emphasized by the Holy Spirit, as he said it would be [John 14: 26]. Saul had been set apart for that work at his conversion, as the Lord had revealed to Ananias [Acts 9: 15]. Barnabas had already shown special fitness for this office by his readiness to receive Gentiles into the church and by his championship of their cause. Both had prepared themselves to carry the gospel to the heathen by prayer and study. They had sought and found their mission through the Scriptures [Acts 13: 47]. The Holy Spirit had chosen them and called on the church to set them apart. How had he done this? Probably by the voice of the prophets and teachers. The church, having resolved under the guidance of the Spirit to fulfill the command of Christ, laid hands on Barnabas and Saul, thus formally recognizing the divine appointment, and pledged itself to support them and to keep them in its prayers. This being done, the church bade them Godspeed and sent them on their journey.

What have we to learn from this initiation of the work of foreign missions? We see that the church, following the guidance of the Holy Spirit, selected its best men for that work. No service of Christ calls for greater consecration, or more wisdom and tact, than this of introducing the gospel to those ignorant of it and prejudiced against any religion other than that which they have inherited. The missionary who is provincial in his training, who burdens the gospel he carries to the heathen with insistence on non-essentials and on the adoption of the customs with which he has been familiar, will prove to be worse than a failure. There were such missionaries in the first century. They followed Saul and Barnabas, and sometimes preceded them, trying to make the people who had become Christians believe they could not be saved unless they were circumcised and obeyed the regulations of the Jewish Church. Is that class of missionaries yet extinct?

3. First labors and triumphs. Barnabas took the lead and selected his birthplace, Cyprus, for the first place to be visited. Some tidings of the gospel had already reached there [Acts 11: 19]. They went through the whole island, preaching in the synagogues, but no marked result seems to have followed till they came to Paphos. There they met Elymas the magian, who represented another religion which had great power over many. He matched his influence against that of these messengers of the new faith. The proconsul was interested, and his heart inclined to accept the tidings and to become a disciple of Christ. But the power of this worker of magic arts was strong, and his effort was persistent. The conflict is briefly told, but it is probably one of the most important in the history of the primitive church. Saul now for the first time came to the front, with a wonderful access of power from the Holy Spirit, and completely discomfited his foe. The proconsul became a believer, and probably a leader in the new church.

From that hour Saul became Paul and took the lead. The company left Cyprus and came into the region of Paul's early life, there beginning anew their missionary work. John Mark was unwilling to go, perhaps fearing the dangers before them. His action led, not many years after, to a sharp dispute between Barnabas and Paul, the former leaving the company of the latter and going again with Mark to Cyprus [Acts 15: 36-40].

Missions, through the work of Paul, soon became the most prominent interest in the church and its chief inspiration. They are the most potent motive of the church today. But we have the added impulse which is given through knowledge of what missions have done. They have penetrated the sluggish life of China with new vigor, have pierced the darkness of Africa with rays of light, have called dead India to life, have brought to Japan the dawn of a new day, and have lifted the pagan islands of the Pacific into civilization. The triumphs of the gospel in heathen lands are a constant argument to prove its source divine. Let this summary, published not long ago, stand as an example:

> During the century missionary societies have increased in number twenty-eight-fold, or from 7 to 194. Missionaries have increased over forty-fold, or from 170 to 7,000. Contributions for foreign missionary purposes have increased forty-five-fold, or from $250,000 to $11,250,000 in America and Great Britain alone. Converts have increased from 5,000 to 3,000,000. Translations into other languages than our own have increased from 50 to 350 languages. At the beginning of the century there were but 5,000,000 Bibles in the world, and the sacred Book could be read only by one-fifth of the human race; today there are more than 160,000,000, and it is accessible to nine-tenths of the race. In 70 years 300 islands in the Pacific have been evangelized, and their 750,000 Christians now contribute $20,000,000 annually to the world's commerce.

HARPER'S DICTIONARY OF CLASSICAL LITERATURE AND ANTIQUITIES

This elaborate work has been edited by Prof. H. T. Peck of Columbia University. The greater part of its biographical and geographical material is based upon Dr. Smith's Greek and Roman Classical Dictionary, as revised and enlarged in this country in 1852 by Prof. Charles Anthon and Prof. Henry Drisler, and the archæological part upon Professor Anthon's edition of Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities. In the course of the intervening years, however, many and in some cases considerable changes have become necessary. The progress of historical and archæological research has been so great as to necessitate many alterations and additions to statements made forty five years ago. The leading French, German and other works upon these subjects have been drawn upon freely, and the volume contains an immense amount of the most valuable information well arranged for practical use. Many illustrations, maps, plans, etc., are included.

One of the conspicuous features of the work, which becomes evident at once, is the articles upon special subjects, such as Domus, Diætetica, Dialects, Grimm's Law and Venner's Law, Histrio, Ludi, Ludus Literaria, Religio, Templum, Theatrum, Twelve Tables, etc. These are essays often elaborate and always comprehensive and most instructive, which supply important, and sometimes minute and technical, information clearly. Another valuable feature is the brief bibliography appended to the articles upon special topics.

The biographies of the leading Christian fathers have been included, and those of the most distinguished deceased classical scholars and philologists of later times, even down to our own century, on the ground that they represent distinct stages in the development of classical study. The relation between the Hellenic and the Italic myths—their distinctions, connections and blendings—is explained with care, and the development of the different modern schools of mythology is outlined, although caution is used in stating their conclusions. Ethnic questions are treated upon a similar policy under Geography. Special departments of literary production—e. g., the Epic, Parody, Rhyme, Satire, etc.—are discussed with particular attention to their influence upon modern literature. Antiquities, Archæology and Language also are departments which examination shows to be written and edited ably.

It would be too much to expect entire freedom from lapses in a work so voluminous, and criticism can be made here or there upon the contents of the book. Occasionally a statement needs qualification and some mistakes occur. But we have noticed no error of sufficient importance to diminish seriously the practical serviceableness of the volume, and it will render for years to come important service in the world of scholarship. It is much better than any other existing work of the sort or any other likely to be issued for a long time to come. It is very handsomely printed, and in view of the amount of its material it is a compact and readily usable volume. [Harper & Bros. $6.00.]

CHRISTIAN LIFE IN GERMANY

This volume, by our own Western editor, Rev. Dr. E. F. Williams, deserves a wide circulation. It is the fruit of long and thorough study during personal residence in Germany. The author evidently had exceptional opportunities of informing himself upon his subject, and was not only an intelligent and well-trained observer, but performed his self-imposed task with genuine zeal. Yet enthusiasm never has mastered his pen. The spirit of the book throughout is discriminating and candid. There is no attempt to support a theory, but the purpose is to set forth the actual facts clearly and fully, so that the reader may form his own conclusions. Indeed, a final chapter, summing up what had preceded it, would have been natural and proper, although its absence is not a defect.

Particular topics considered are The Intellectual Training of the People, Their Moral and Religious Life, Social and Industrial Movements and Foreign Missions, and the origin and work of the now deservedly famous Inner Mission is described at great length and very effectively. The last two chapters—on The Social and Moral Condition of Germany since 1860 and Efforts and Measures to Meet the New Dangers of the Times—are specially noteworthy. Dr. Williams has studied the literature of his subject carefully, and makes skillful use of its contributions to knowledge. For a long time to come, until progress inevitably shall have rendered such a work out of date, his pages will possess large value for purposes of reference, and there is no reason why successive editions may not quite keep pace with whatever advance may prove to need chronicling.

But the book is no mere manual for reference. It is a spirited treatise, written in an unusually clear, vigorous manner, and abounding in interest throughout. Not much occurs in the way of illustrative anecdote, but sketches of the lives and characters of many eminent German philanthropists and Christians abound and are uniformly interesting. Less is said than we expected to find about the anti-Semitic movement, but it is described with impartiality, and evidently has more, at least apparent, justification than many Americans have been accustomed to suppose. The volume is one from which Christians and all others who desire the highest welfare of society in other countries should learn much, and its spirit should be imitated by all who discuss such themes. [F. H. Revell Co. $1 00.]

RELIGIOUS

The Self Pronouncing Sunday School Teachers' Bible [National Publishing Co. $6.00] is a handsomely issued volume, based upon the old as well as upon the Revised Versions, showing in a simple and fairly successful manner the changes which the Revised Version has made on its predecessor. In addition to the Old and New Testaments there is a Bible students' helper, containing a large variety of miscellaneous collateral material, treating of the canon of Scripture, the genuineness and integrity of the two Testaments, with summaries of each book, a harmony of the gospels, special prayers in the New Testament, quotations from the Old Testament and references to it contained in the New, etc., and a department about Bible lands, their inhabitants, conformation, etc., a table of obsolete or ambiguous words, a subject index, the new Oxford concordance, a dictionary of Scripture proper names and questions and answers, said to be 4,000 in number, on the Old and New Testaments. There is also an indexed atlas to the Bible, with excellent maps. The type is clear and fairly large in the body of the book, and clear, and as large as possible in view of the amount printed, in that portion containing the helps. All in all it is a most elaborate and handsome edition of the Bible, and worth more for practical use than some editions which cost considerably more money.

Death and Afterwards [New Amsterdam Book Co. 60 cents] is a short essay by Sir Edwin Arnold, to which a supplement containing comments by certain of his friends has been appended. The point of the book is the claim that death probably is a natural and not unpleasant experience, and that there is reasonable ground for the belief in immortality. There is nothing in the book which has not been said in substance before, but the subject is approached from a somewhat new angle, and is treated in a thoughtful and helpful manner. It is more a philosophical than a Christian study, although it is not out of harmony with Christianity.

A new volume in the series called Men of the Bible is St. Paul, His Life and Time [F. H. Revell Co. 75 cents], by Prof. James Iverach. The type is too fine for many eyes, and so good a book should have been given a better chance in this respect. But the contents of it are well worth reading. It is a scholarly presentation of the facts of the great apostle's history and of the substance of his teaching, although the personal element is far more prominent than the theological. It is discriminating and trustworthy.——Great Moments in the Life of Paul [W. J. Shuey. 75 cents] contains a series of lectures or sermons by Rev. Dr. E. W. Work. They deal respectively with special studies on the apostle's life, yet there is a certain connection between them. They are scholarly and suggestive discourses.

In Thoughts from the Mount of Blessing [Pacific Press Publishing Co. 75 cents] are religious suggestions by Mrs. C. G. White. They are not strikingly original, but originality is not necessary to practical serviceableness, and these are simple and telling utterances, intended to quicken spiritual life in the believer and to promote it in those who, as yet, have no experience of it. ——A second volume of Herald Sermons [E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.00], by Dr. G. H. Hepworth, illustrates afresh the timely and practical value of the author's editorials in the Sunday issue of the New York Herald, and it deserves a hearty welcome because it is well suited to interest and benefit a very large range of readers, and is delightfully simple and wholesome in the manner in which it applies spirituality to life.

The F. H. Revell Co. have issued attractively Did the Pardon Come too Late? [30 cents] by Mrs. Maud Ballington Booth. It is a pathetic and touching, but not altogether sad, sketch of the story of a converted convict, written out of the heart and likely to do good.——The Open Secret [Thomas Whittaker. 50 cents], by A Priest, is a peculiar little book. It assumes the opening of communication between our world and the planet Mars, and purports to report the substance of information about the future life received from certain dwelers in Mars. It affords an ingenious way of stating the author's notions about the future life, which are interesting and promotive of reflection. He believes in the possibility, but not the inevitablity, of immortality, and in various respects his ideas are somewhat novel.

STORIES

Mrs. Helen C. Prince's story, A Transatlantic Chatelaine [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25], will be enjoyed quite as much as its predecessor, Christine Rochefort. International marriages usually prove mistakes, and this is no exception to the rule. Yet had the heroine followed the real prompting of her heart her marriage doubtless would have been happy. Her peculiar history on each side of the ocean is most interesting, and the author has drawn in her a distinct and delightful character, noble and beautiful in most respects and somewhat original. The style of the work is choice throughout. The pictures of French life afford glimpses of characters and scenes not often revealed to American eyes, and the moral lesson of the story is impressive. The book is destined, we are sure, to be read widely.

The Harpers have issued Thomas Hardy's The Well Beloved [$1.50], a sketch of a temperament. It is an amusing study, amusing in its very seriousness, of a man in love with an ideal, which he thought he found now in one woman and now in another, loyally transferring himself and his allegiance from woman to woman in pursuit of the ideal, somewhat to their confusion, until, among others, he had proposed to marry an early lady-love, her daughter and ultimately her granddaughter. This somewhat daring conception of the author is worked out with as much gravity as is consistent with the situation, and we recommend it to Mr. W. S. Gilbert for his consideration. One does not sympathize so much with the various agonies of the hero as he would under other circumstances, and the final outcome, which is the elopement of the granddaughter fiancée with another man more nearly of her period in life, hardly deserves to be condemned. The ultimate marriage of the hero himself with another early flame, not in the direct line of descent, is rather a commonplace ending of his somewhat unique story.

The Green Book, or Freedom Under the Snow [Harper & Bros. $1.50] is by Maurice Jokai and has been translated by Mrs. Waugh. The main drift of the story is suggested by a conspiracy against Alexander I. of Russia. Pushkin, the eminent Russian poet, is a prominent character, and the life of St. Petersburg, the gayeties and intrigues of court circles, the oppressiveness and the corruption of the czar's favorites, the daring and activity of the conspirators and the loves of several men and women blend to form the thread of the narrative. It is a spirited and intensely interesting tale and apparently faithful to the Russian life of that period. It illustrates powerfully, also, the enormous power and the comparative helplessness of the czar, who, theoretically, can do almost anything which is inherently possible, but who is so hoodwinked and influenced by his favorites that he is practically impotent. The translator appears to have done her work very well.

The Falcon of Langèac [Copeland & Day. $1.50], by Isabel Whiteley, is a lively, interesting French story of love and its obstacles and of the rough, turbulent life of the Brittany, and indeed of the France in general, of long ago. The scene is laid chiefly in the region of Dinan and St. Malo, and the author has entered into the spirit of the time successfully and has described its life with graphic and enjoyable clearness.——The Three Richard Whalens [F. A. Stokes Co. 75 cents] is a story of adventure by J. K. Reeve. A solitary island, hidden treasure, the fruits of unrighteous buccaneering, the adventures of searchers for this treasure and their opponents are leading elements in the story, which is short, lively and interesting.——Perfection City [50 cents], by Mrs. Orpen, is one of Appleton's Town and Country Library. It introduces the reader to a "community" in the West which ultimately goes to pieces, owing to the rivalry among the women for the affections of one of the men. It is readable enough for the cars or the hammock.

MISCELLANEOUS

Mrs. Rose Hawthorne Lathrop's Memories of Hawthorne [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $2 00] have been appearing in one of the magazines, and abundantly deserve to be collected into permanent form in such a volume as this. If they abound in hero worship, it is only the natural and beautiful admiration of an intelligent daughter for such a father as Hawthorne. Many interesting comments are made upon Emerson, Thoreau, Miss Peabody and other friends of the family in this and other lands. Many extracts from family letters are included, and the domestic atmosphere pervades the work delightfully and nowhere oppressively. The volume is a charming addition to the literature relating to its distinguished subject, and will be one of the popular books for summer reading in this country.

Book and Heart [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.56] contains a series of short papers by Col. T. W. Higginson, most of which have appeared in the Forum, the Outlook, Independent or elsewhere. They treat of contemporary subjects, and are written in the literary rather than in the strictly critical vein, and discuss their respective themes in a practical and general way which is very agreeable. Some of their topics are Manuscripts of Keats and Shelley, Lowell's Closing Years in Cambridge, Local Fiction, the Cant of Cosmopolitanism, the Future of Polite Society the Complaint of the Poor, the Antidote to Money and Our Criticism of Foreign Visitors. They are suggestive, stimulating papers, written out of a long and rich experience, such as only a keen observer and a naturally thoughtful mind accumulates. The book is a good one to have lying at hand for odd moments.

Four volumes of the New American Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica are at hand. They cover the alphabet from A to SAR. They have been edited by Prof. D. O. Kellogg, with the aid of competent writers, and contain many hundred special articles by authors of repute. The character of the work which they supplement is so well known that it is necessary only to say here that these additional volumes abundantly maintain the high standard of the main work. They include many American subjects, supplying brief sketches of many distinguished Americans, of events in American history and of American towns and cities. Portraits of a large number of more or less famous people are supplied. The work has been done discriminatingly and thoroughly on the part of contributors and editors and the large and permanent value of such a work needs no comment. There may be some differences of opinion as to the inclusion of some subjects and the omission of others, but these always must exist and in general the judgment of the editors tors will be indorsed upon consideration. [Werner Co. Each $3 00.]

A new edition of Mr. J. K. Hoyt's Cyclopædia of Practical Quotations, from English, Latin and modern foreign languages, is out revised, corrected and enlarged. Hundreds of new quotations have been added, and the concordance has been greatly elaborated. The first edition appeared over twelve years ago, and the book has done practical service and received wide recognition. In the present edition the plan of the original work has been somewhat altered. Certain departments have been omitted and the places of others have been changed, yet the book is in all essentials similar to the original. It is conveniently arranged for use, handsomely printed, thoroughly indexed and tabulated, and will continue to find favor with the literary public. [Funk & Wagnalls Co. $6 00.]

Easter Bells [Harper & Bros. $1 25] is another book of poems from the facile pen of Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster. Some of them have appeared already in our own columns; all of them, we understand, have appeared somewhere. We have often stated our appreciation of Mrs. Sangster's felicity in the expression of sentiment, and the sentiment which she expresses is invariably elevated and ennobling. These poems are no less musical than their predecessors from her pen, and no less choice in the interpretation of life and the suggestions which they convey. We gladly recommend them.——Songs After Work [A. D. F. Randolph & Co. 75 cents], by L. J. Magee, contains a collection of short poems which vary considerably in excellence, but are interesting and some of which are striking. The book leaves a pleasant impression.

The Aurora Borealis [D. Appleton & Co. $1.75], by Alfred Angot, belongs to the International Science Series and is a scientific work of special interest to scholars, but written with sufficient simplicity to be intelligible to those who are only students. The latest scientific information is comprehended in it and it is illustrated.——Two more volumes of the International Education Series come from the Appletons, of which one is School Management and School Methods, by Prof. Joseph Baldwin, LL. D., and the other is Froebel's Educational Laws for Teachers [Each $1.50], by J. L. Hughes. They deal with the same general theme in different ways. Mr. Hughes supplies Froebel's interpretation and exposition of general principles, while Professor Baldwin deals with management and methods in detail. The one book prepares the way for the other and the two should be studied together. Each in its own field is a fine piece of work.

MORE APRIL MAGAZINES

Senator Hoar's paper in the Forum [$3 00], entitled Is the Senate Degenerating? is greatly needed just now. The Senate seems to be hard at work to contradict the author's claim, but such a plea as this has some reason behind it, and should be well weighed, although it is not convincing. Ex-Secretary J. S. Morton pleads for re-

We value it monthly more and more.——Literary News [$1.00] attempts less, as its lower price suggests, but what it does it does very well and we commend it.

NOTES

—— According to Ian Maclaren, Harold Frederic is the American author most widely read in England at present.

—— Probably very few persons appreciate the fact that only about 125,000,000 of people speak English while more than 400,000,000 speak Chinese.

—— The alumni of Harvard propose to convert the venerable Holden Chapel into a library of English and Saxon literature, with a memorial window, in honor of the late Prof. Francis J. Child.

—— The Dante Society of Cambridge, Mass., is publishing, as its fifteenth annual report, a bibliography of all the works concerning Dante done by Americans or in America. It is called Dante in America.

—— Mr. Henry S. Merriman, an English novelist, protests, and very properly, against the issue by the American Publishers' Corporation of one of his earlier novels, A Slave of the Lamp, with the title, Christian Dellacott, the Journalist, and with no intimation that it is not a new story.

—— Mr. Gladstone defines the six qualifications of a book-collector to be "appetite, leisure, wealth, knowledge, discrimination and perseverance." He is gradually transferring the bulk of his library to an institution at Hawarden called St. Deniol's. The volume which he has owned longest is Sacred Dramas, given him personally by Hannah More who wrote it.

—— The Bookman thinks that two portraits of Virgil are in existence. It says:

> Lovers of classical study, and especially persons interested in iconography, will read with interest an announcement lately made by M. Gaston Boissier relating to the discovery at a military encampment in Tunis of a mosaic representing Virgil composing the Æneid. This mosaic is about a yard square, and shows the poet clothed in a white toga bordered in blue, and with buskins on his feet. He is seated and holds upon his knees a scroll partly open. On one side stands Clio, and on the other Melpomene, to whom the poet is evidently listening with fixed eyes, and a look upon his face as of one inspired. This discovery gives us in all probability an authentic portrait of Virgil, and it may be dated as early as the latter part of the first century of the Christian era.

The other is that in the Codex Vaticanus, not earlier than the fourth century. They present the same face.

SUNDAY SCHOOL NOTES

A marked improvement is reported from many schools in the matter of using Bibles in the class.

The Louisville Union holds institutes four evenings this week in different parts of the city, and four primary conferences meet in the afternoons.

New Jersey has 20 Primary Workers' Unions, of which 18 hold a weekly meeting. A summer school of primary methods will be held in Asbury Park for a week from July 5.

Framingham Primary Union has been conducted this year by Miss A. S. Burpee of Boston, a trained kindergarten teacher. Each Thursday afternoon the lesson for the following Sunday is taught.

Mr. Joseph N. Dummer, of the Massachusetts Sunday School Association, has prepared an illustrated lecture on the Life and Travels of St. Paul. The 60 stereopticon views are taken from nature and from the works of the masters.

A beautifully embossed and color-printed Easter souvenir card was issued by the Young Men's Southgate Class of Pilgrim School, Worcester. It contains lists of the names and addresses of members, class organization and the organization of the school in 1883 and 1897.

The Massachusetts Association held district conventions April 6 at Ipswich, 7th at Westport Central Village, 8th at New Bedford and 9th at Acushnet. At Whitinsville on the 14th and at Melrose on the 15th large and enthusiastic audiences enjoyed profitable conventions of three sessions each.

The Maryland Union held its 51st anniversary in Baltimore, April 6. Rev. C. A. Dickey, D.D., delivered the annual address. The union has helped needy schools from its treasury, strengthened the work and won for itself general approval. Of Maryland's population there are 285,453 between five and 18 years of age, and 205,525 of them attend Sunday school, while only 161,082 are in day schools. The State population is 850,000.

A Flooded District of the Northwest

The Red River Valley in northern Minnesota and North Dakota has had unusually high water this spring. The snowfall the past winter surpassed anything in the history of the State, the storms beginning in November and continuing at intervals until the end of March. The accumulated snows melted suddenly, and the overflow has reached dimensions never before known. It is not unusual for the Red River to get out of its banks, and the few days of inconvenience is more than compensated by the good crops that have always followed.

For fifteen years, however, nothing like the flood of the present year has been known, and never before has the water done any material damage. The south part of the city of Fargo was under water a few days only, causing great inconvenience, the damage to paving, sidewalks and foundations being the principal loss. Many were driven from their homes, and were cared for by the citizens. The city refused Government aid from the appropriation by Congress, preferring to be reimbursed out of the increased crops and business expected next fall.

The care of local sufferers will, however, make it impossible to carry extra burdens. A letter from a leading member of the board of Fargo College to President Simmons, now in the East, says, "You can see the futility of trying to raise money here to meet the present distress of the teachers in the college, who have used up their resources and must be paid something on their salaries."

The noble work being done by Fargo College will surely appeal in this time of special distress to the hearts of the benevolent.

The flood down the Red River increased in depth and breadth as the accumulated waters proceeded. At Grand Forks, where the Red Lake River joins the Red River of the North, the waters rose to about forty feet. The waters receded as fast as they rose. The streets where the block pavement has been washed out were a dismal sight, but plucky hearts and willing hands gathered the blocks and relaid the pavement. During the high water rescue boats visited submerged farms. One man could not save his cows, but had his horses in his house safe, while the chickens were in the barn loft and the turkeys on the ridge-pole.

In a few weeks the great flood of 1897 will be history, and the busy farms and growing towns and cities will be about their usual business of furnishing bread for the millions and houses for the thousands who are coming to make their homes in this rich valley.

Fortunately for Fargo College the flood came in vacation week, and the opening of the term was delayed only a few days. If by Commencement, June 16, the financial stress upon the unpaid teachers shall be relieved by timely gifts from thoughtful friends all connected with the college will be full of gratitude.

RELIEF WORK IN MARSOVAN

BY REV. CHARLES C. TRACY

In the winter of 1895-6, just after the massacres, the condition of the people was simply horrible. We were then in a hand-to-hand struggle to save them from cold and starvation. Aid in food, covering and money was distributed from this center as expeditiously as possible. During the present winter the character of the relief work is different. The distress is not generally of that sharp character involving immediate loss of life in default of speedy aid. Relief is now a ministration to continued and grinding want. There are many people who manage to find half of an adequate subsistence and live on "at a poor, dying rate." There are lean and worn mothers and hungry, half-clad children. For fathers and brothers there is little work and little pay. In such a condition many will linger on in misery and finally succumb.

A favorite mode with us is the industrial method of relief. The weaving of gingham by the hand loom has been for years the great industry of this and neighboring cities. The sad events of the fall of 1895 completely overthrew this business for the time. We thought we saw in the emergency the opportunity to accomplish several useful things at a stroke. By starting the looms we could furnish work and sustenance to the poor without pauperizing them. We could give them occupation for their minds and hands, and do something to restore tone to the spirits of the people cowering in their houses, quivering with fear and half insane, with nothing to do but ponder horrors. This would be an economical method. By selling the product of the looms we could recover a considerable portion of the money thus spent and use it again.

In every particular our reasoning has proved correct. The result has been gratifying beyond all expectation. In this town we have had woven 80,000 yards of gingham, furnishing subsistence to hundreds of people. This effort brought back spirit and cheerfulness to many. Other people soon began to set up looms. The poor were helped without becoming direct objects of charity. The gingham sold so well that we recovered near or quite the whole cost of production, and so we are using the same funds over and over in the same way. Another point was made, which was unforeseen by us. We required absolute honesty in the weaving of the cloth. If any piece was dishonestly woven we took away the work from that house. The result was an important lesson in integrity, and the product of our looms came to be recognized as reliable, and was sought for and seized upon at once by buyers. Everybody knows that we are here for purposes of evangelization and Christian education, not to carry on manufactures. But it is gratifying to find that our looms have preached the gospel of truth and honesty.

The care of the sick has involved great burden and difficulty. Of late we are blessed with the presence of an English woman, an experienced trained nurse, who has greatly relieved the overworked missionary women. We have a temporary hospital and dispensary. A few beds are provided for the sick, but patients coming on set days, and those treated outside, are not less than 100 a week.

We are carrying on a growing work for orphans, particularly massacre orphans, for the rescue and sustenance of whom such funds as The Congregationalist's have been provided. We house fifty boys and fifty girls. The outlook indicates that we shall be importuned to receive many more. Indeed, if we undertake to relieve the desperate need in the regions east of our field, by accepting some of their thousands of helpless children, there is no telling where we can place a limit. The care of orphans partakes more of the character of permanency than any other branch of the relief work. The people can depend upon nothing. All we can do is to go on relieving distress while it exists in the wisest ways we can invent, hoping that Christendom will stand by till the struggle is past.

Modern science and philosophy have been gradually undermining this atomistic system, evolution, with its doctrine of the common origin of the race; traducianism, with its declaration that soul as well as body is derived from our ancestry; sociology, with its recognition of corporate good and evil; political ethics, with its attribution to the state of a quasi-personality; all these have been working to the advantage of Christian theology. Visiting the sins of the fathers on the children was thought to be most irrational, so long as it was seen only in Scripture; but, now that it takes the name of heredity, it is just as vigorously applauded. It once seemed harsh to say that the soul that sinneth it shall die, but when this is called the reign of law, the only danger is that even God will be denied the power to save the sinner. We have taken at least this step forward—we see that humanity is one, that it has a common origin, a common evil, a common destiny. Realism has superseded the scheme of arbitrary imputation. —President Strong of Rochester University.

SOMETHING MORE THAN FANATICISM

Touching the article on the Turkish question in The Congregationalist March 18, by Rev. E. H. Byington, may I call attention to two facts? In recalling the accounts of the battles at Plevna and in the Shipka Pass, as they were reported in the papers at the time, it occurs to me that the main explanation given for the reverses of Russia, or rather for the severe check she at first received, was that the rifle used by the Turkish army was superior to that used by Russia. I remember several statements to the effect that iron shields used on Russian rifle pits were penetrated by Turkish bullets at distances where similar defenses on the Turkish side were proof against Russian rifle-shots. If these statements were true, it may be that something other than fanaticism entered into the problem.

Another fact which the fanaticism explanation utterly fails to interpret is in the present situation. So far as we at this distance can judge, it appears that the fanaticism which kills Armenians is completely under the control of orders from Constantinople. It is true that Constantinople is far to the northwest of the geographical center of the sultan's dominions, but it is also true that it is the political center. That fanaticism which kills when it is assured of support from Constantinople, and spares when other orders emanate from Yildiz Kiosk, is hardly of the unthinking kind, and this evident connection between Constantinople and Armenia makes it plain that the proper pressure brought to bear in the city would accomplish results in the province. But the vacillating policy which orders warships up on one day to order them back—perhaps at the beck of Russia—on the next is not the kind which either deserves or receives the respect of the general community.

The problem is difficult. The slavery problem was difficult. But standing to one side in utter indecision is not going to solve any problem, however difficult. The United States deserved and received the scorn of Englishmen while we stood in hesitation and cowardice before the slave power, and the so-called Powers deserve contempt, and doubtless receive it, as they stand in the same position before the great assassin. To assume that they are afraid of fanaticism, even if it were supported by the facts, is, after all, only to assume that they are afraid. And a beautiful picture they make!

LABORERS AND MINISTERS

The error of your editorial on Laborers and Ministers consists in not taking into consideration the time the worker is obliged to lose during the year. In the majority of the cases referred to the laborer only has about six months' work during the year. Skilled masons may receive their $4 50 to $5 a day when they work. But it is very irregular work at the best. It is here a half-day, a day and a half in another place and so on, and my observation is that they have but little work winters. The same is true of boot and shoe workers and others. W. H. W.

UNION BETWEEN "CHRISTIANS" AND CONGREGATIONALISTS

We deprecate the multiplication of sects. But we think there ought to be enough so that every Christian ought to be able to live in peace in some one of them. It is pretty certain that they could not all live together unless the peculiarities of some of them were much modified. External unity which promotes discord is mischievous. We hope for more intimate relations between the two denominations, the Christians and the Congregationalists. But we do not anticipate organic union in the near future, except, perhaps, between individual churches where there is no need for both denominations in the same locality. A minister of considerable experience writes to us concerning this matter:

> It seems to me that the proposed union between Congregational churches and Christian churches would not be wise, unless the action should result in sifting out a good many of the latter. My experience covers parts of three States, and I have never met with more than one Christian church with which it might be desirable to come into organic unity, and, what is more, I have never talked with any Congregational minister whose experience did not corroborate my own. Theoretically, of course, there should be no obstacle in the way of unity, from either the standpoint of doctrine or polity, but for reasons plainly evident to a scrutinizing eye the union would be neither agreeable, universal nor lasting. And this opinion appears also to be held on the other side, perhaps arising from widely different causes. E. H.

AN OPEN LETTER TO DEACON DUDLEY

We have followed with great interest your experiences in Boston churches and places of worship. Not only have readers of The Congregationalist enjoyed these reports, we have also gained some lessons in church behavior, treatment due to strangers and charity for those differing from us in religious opinions. I voice the sentiments of my neighbors and say we hope to hear from you and your good wife many times yet with increasing pleasure and profit. F. H. W.

CHURCH ENTERTAINMENTS—THE REMEDY

Recent magazine articles have directed public attention to the low standard of taste prevailing in church entertainments. Instances are not infrequent in which songs, recitations and impersonations that are coarse, and even vulgar, are presented in church parlors, sometimes by amateurs, more often by that class of professionals who make a living by going into partnership with churches in the show business.

The present difficulty is due largely to carelessness, and this carelessness has been made possible by the defective centralization of the various societies and committees working in connection with the social and charitable life of the church. In a word, it is due to the absence of any central supervising responsibility.

The authority properly belongs to the pastor as the head of the church family. But many pastors forbear to exercise it, preferring to take a laissez-faire attitude, and confining themselves to their pulpit and pastoral work except when their advice is sought. The result is that the question of what entertainments shall be admitted to the church is left to settle itself according to the taste of the various societies and committees. It is almost inevitable that, left in this way, matters will drift from bad to worse, until something occurs which shocks and humiliates all concerned.

These lines are written in the fresh recollection of an experience of this kind, which has led one pastor to reproach himself bitterly with remissness, and to resolve that in the future a most rigid personal supervision shall be exercised over all programs to be presented in the parlors of the church. In the case referred to, the young semi-professional who gave the vulgar recitations and impersonations declared that he had given them repeatedly in large churches of a neighboring city without any objection having been made. If his statement was true it is a commentary on the taste of the churches, and suggests that this evil may be even wider spread and deeper seated than we have realized.

We shall all agree that if amusements and entertainments are to be admitted at all to the rooms of the church, they must be above reproach in point of morals and good taste. The cases are rare where that can be secured without careful and constant supervision. The churches should not wait until they have been taught the lesson by some bitter experience. Let the standing committee adopt a rule that all programs must be submitted to the pastor before they are given. This action of the committee will relieve the pastor of the sometimes unpleasant duty of taking the initiative, and it will place the responsibility in the hands of the one who is likely to suffer most when any reproach is brought upon the good name of the church. A PASTOR.

POINTS ON CANDIDATING

The competitive method of candidating, so common at present, is criticised by some because it tends to "cheapen" the average clergyman in the estimation of the average layman. Whatever may be true on that point, the method is certainly unfair in its workings. The average human memory is a leaky vessel, and the impressions which an average candidate makes on an average congregation are more or less fugitive. For this reason, the chances of the first candidate in any batch who are to be heard before action is taken on any one of them are by no means equal to those of the last. Time has dulled his image in the memory of his hearers and obliterated some of the good impressions he made. Each succeeding candidate has left impressions more or less prejudicial to his interests. When the voting day arrives, therefore, his chances are by no means what they were that Monday morning when he took the train for home with the cordial "Good-by," and "We hope to hear you again" of the committee sounding in his ears. The same thing is relatively true of each of his competitors, except the last on the list. His chances are at their best. His image still preserves its true outlines and colors in the memory of his hearers, and the impressions he made have still on them the bloom of freshness. Under such unequal conditions fair play at the polls is out of the question. Clearly something should be done to correct this inherent defect, so that each candidate may suffer only a minimum of harm by the lapse of time and reap the full benefit of the impressions he makes, whether he stands first or last on the list.

The writer ventures to suggest that the aid of modern invention might be invoked to this end with excellent effect. (1) The candidating church might secure for a season (anywhere from a month to a year or two) the loan of a good phonograph. Then each candidate could be heard over again, words and tones, wholly or in part, on the voting day, by simply turning a crank. (2) As an aid in recalling the personal appearance of each candidate while sitting, praying and preaching, the kodak could be used with excellent results. Half a dozen snap shots could be taken of each candidate in the various attitudes mentioned. These, after being carefully developed, could be passed around among the voters, and they would be found wonderfully helpful in recalling vividly the personal appearance of each candidate. (3) Finally, a chart of sufficient dimensions to afford space for the name, titles, age and social condition of each candidate, the date when he preached, his text and his theological leanings, would be found useful. The chart, when properly filled out, should be hung in a conspicuous place, where it can be seen and easily read by every voter.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS

Holy Week services have been quite general this year, perhaps more so in our churches than ever before. The greatest help and success in such special arrangements have come from those fields where largest preparation was made. Union services throughout the week or at the midweek service and early morning prayer meetings gave variety to the plans in some places. Pastors and people have developed mutually helpful thoughts along appropriate lines and an interchange of preachers and leaders of meetings have interested different churches in each other. Where extra efforts have been successful no doubt another year will find an even larger interest in this season.

The choice of two leading church members in Iowa and Colorado to the responsible office of mayor in a single week indicates the growth of the idea of municipal reform, and augurs well for the political future of our cities. We feel a new debt of gratitude to the author of America when we find his patriotism reproduced in his son, one of the Christian laymen above referred to.

In the State of Washington four nuclei of churches result from the quiet, gratuitous labors of an uncommissioned minister and his wife. We are glad that one of the four has been saved to the denomination. Happy the church that secures the ministrations of a pastor whose work is so evidently sealed by the Spirit.

That small church in Kansas which, by the united action of its various departments, raised $100 for home missions shows how worth while it is to "think you can," "say you will," trust God and go forward.

Never before has that Southern State association which is reported below enjoyed the luxury of electric lights and a welcome from the mayor. The members construe both as significant signs of better times.

A reception in California shows that, while the United States may be the solvent of the nations, Christianity is the great unifier which fuses even antagonistic elements into a homogeneous whole.

The intelligible setting forth in its new pamphlet, by a Massachusetts church, of what church members should know makes it of especial value to the congregation.

The "pastors' cadets" of Philadelphia looks like a twin organization of the Boys' Brigade.

Of Special Note

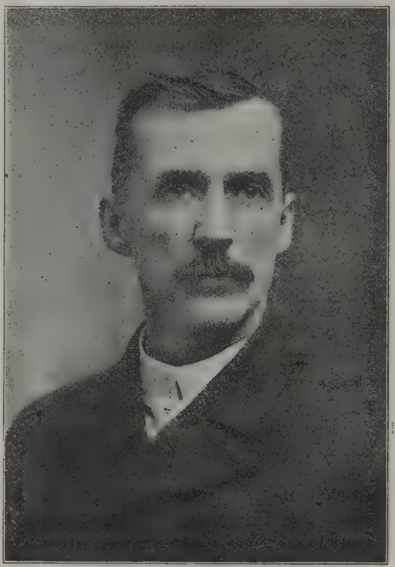
A remarkably prosperous brief pastorate in Michigan.

A ST. LOUIS CHURCH AND ITS NEW LEADER

A brief sketch of Compton Hill Church, and of its pastor, Rev. D. M. Fisk, Ph. D., will be of interest in view of the meeting of the State Association to be held there next week.

The Fifth Congregational Church of St. Louis, now the Compton Hill, was organized in 1881 in the chapel at Twenty-third Street and Clark Avenue. It has since grown out of this frame building into the brick chapel on Compton Hill, and thence into the magnificent stone edifice with its splendid organ on the corner of Lafayette and Compton Avenues. The initial membership of thirty-seven has increased to 420. The leading personality during these years has been Dr. G. C. Adams, now of San Francisco. The cyclone of last year caused the removal of a number of families and affected the character of the population and the value of real estate in the vicinity. Still the church stands in a promising territory surrounded by the more prosperous of the middle classes, as well as by some families who may be accounted rich. It is also within reach of the poor. There is a strong German element.



REV. D. M. FISK, PH. D.

Dr. Fisk was born in New Hampton, N. H., graduated in 1869 from Brown University, and held the chair of biology for fourteen years in Hillsdale College, Michigan. He was ordained in 1886, has held pastorates in Jackson, Mich., and Toledo, O., and has recently accepted a call to this church, at a salary of $3,500. Dr. Fisk believes in his opportunity. He is popular with the young people, attracts the middle classes, and the church is rallying about him with courage and expectation. He has been twice abroad, has a large library, and is a diligent student and fearless preacher. His popularity as a college professor has been fully maintained as a clergyman, and he leaves in the three cities of his residence permanent evidences of his diligence and enthusiasm.

COLLEGE Y. M. C. A. CONFERENCE

John R. Mott's recent visit to the colleges of mission lands has been characterized as the most remarkable single journey in the history of modern missions. Hence it is not strange that a conference, under his leadership, of the presidents of the college Young Men's Christian Associations of the East should have attracted the leaders of the religious work in forty colleges, comprising a student body of 25,000. The three days' session, recently, was held at the Boston Association Building. All departments of the work were carefully presented by such leaders as Mr. Mott, Gilbert A. Beaver of New York, W. H Sallmon of Yale, F. S. Goodman of New York, Hugh Beaver of Pennsylvania and G. M. Fisher of Boston. Especial emphasis was laid upon the grave responsibilities of the president.

The most impressive address was that delivered by Mr. Mott at Clarendon Street Church, Sunday morning, before the delegates and a large mixed audience. With marked simplicity and power he recounted the formation of the World's Student Christian Federation, which binds together twelve national college association unions, and constitutes a surer guarantee of international comity and peace than many an arbitration treaty. Within twenty months he traveled 60,000 miles, labored in 22 countries and in 144 universities and schools, presided or assisted at 21 conventions, attended by 3,300 students and teachers representing 308 institutions, and met personally 1,300 missionaries. Incidental results were the definite conversion of 505 young men, nearly all students, and the enlistment of 260 students in a student volunteer movement for home missions.

THE GEORGIA CONVENTION

Great interest in Congregational circles throughout the State centered in the sixth annual meeting held with the First Church, Savannah, Rev. L. B. Maxwell, pastor, April 7, 8. Twenty of the thirty-seven delegates were present, sixteen being colored. Rev. George Rowe acted as moderator, Rev. A. L. Demond as secretary.

Special interest centered in the report of the Sunday school committee. The convention voted to recommend the publication of a child's history of Congregationalism, as a means of stimulating an interest and love among the children for the denomination. Excellent addresses were made on the debt owed the two missionary societies that have operated chiefly in the South, but it was urged that every church take up contributions for all our denominational societies.

Rev. R. R. Meredith, D. D., of Brooklyn was providentially present, being in the South in search of health, and greatly helped the convention by his counsels, and especially by his masterly sermon. He stirred the congregation at a large mass meeting with the appropriate theme, Congregationalism for the Great South. In short addresses the simplicity, breadth and adaptability of Congregationalism were also set forth.

Much interest culminated in the complaint from the First Church, Atlanta, relative to the refusal on the part of the Gainesville district conference for its admission. After careful deliberation by a special committee, of which Dr. Meredith was made chairman, it was recommended, in view of all circumstances, to pass the matter as "a mutual misunderstanding." It was strenuously held that the refusal was not inspired by the caste spirit. The same church is to apply to its nearest conference again, as was announced in the conference, and it will be contrary to legitimate expectations if then the caste spirit manifests itself in view of its emphatic disavowal on the part of those in authority.

Two new district conferences were added to he convention. The delegates at the close tood with clasped hands and sang "Blest be he tie." They meet next at Savannah.

THE ALABAMA STATE MEETING

The churches, Sunday schools and Woman's Missionary Union of the State had a successful meeting at Mobile, March 25–30. It was he twenty-second annual gathering of the hurches, most of which were represented by pastors and delegates. The Mobile church for several months has been without a pastor but it provided hospitably for the guests for nearly a week.

The sessions were held in the pretty meeting house recently repaired and fitted with electric lighting. The mayor of the city was present at the opening meeting with a hearty welcome. The roll-call brought out many new faces, and the venerable presence of Dr. Andrews of Talladega College was an inspiration. Being the father of the association, his words of counsel were well received by the younger delegates. The absence of the A. M. A. representative was keenly felt. Some officer of that body is always looked for and his presence is a source of strength.

The daily meetings were conducted so as to impress the public with the good points of Congregationalism. The subjects showed the members to be alive to the needs of the hour, and included The Power and Privilege of Prayer; The Christian Home; Some Defects in Our Sunday Schools; How to Inculcate the Spirit of Benevolence; The Sabbath: Its Observance, Its Desecration; How Will a Missionary Enterprise Reveal Itself in Action? and The Work of the Congregational Churches. The sermons preached to the association and to the churches of the city were unusually thoughtful. The work of the A. M. A. was shown by object lessons in the persons of the men and women who are products of its schools.

Reports from the churches were, on the whole, encouraging. Some are barely holding their own, owing to industrial conditions. Others are steadily gaining ground, and are recognized more and more as a part of their communities. In places where, a few years ago, Congregationalism was bitterly opposed it is winning its way, and some pastors report that they are members of the ministers' unions in their respective cities. Christian Endeavor, humane, temperance and similar societies are doing good work among the young people. Financially the past year has been hard. One new church, whose pastor is a converted Jew, was added to the roll.

A glowing account of the A. M. A. Jubilee meeting at Boston was given by Rev. James Brown. A suggestion, by Rev. J. J. Scott, that the Alabama Association ought to take at least one share in the Jubilee Fund for the A. M. A. debt was enthusiastically seconded on all sides, and under his magnetic leadership pledges ranging from $5 to five cents, and aggregating more than $60, were easily secured. The balance over the $50 required was voted to a needy sister church at La Pine.

Rev. Spencer Snell set forth Congregationalism in such a clear and masterly way as to be a stimulant to the cause in this Southland. The next meeting will be at Marion.

FIFTY YEARS AT LAWRENCE

The oldest church in this manufacturing city of Massachusetts, the Lawrence Street, turned its 50th corner last week Sunday. The meeting house was beautified by special floral decorations, and the exercises proved interesting to the many attendants at the services. Rev. W. E. Wolcott, the pastor, gave the historical address. It is to be recalled that six pastors in all had served the church, 1,369 persons had been received to membership and $60,000 had been given in benevolences. The beginnings of the church date back of the city's name, and had their origin in a single religious service which began a series later and encouraged the formation of a Sunday school. Dr. Lyman Whiting was the first pastor, being engaged soon after his first sermon there. Various elements were consolidated into the new church, which soon had to enlarge its quarters and erected the present building in 1847–8. Among the other pastors were: Rev. Messrs. H. M. Storrs, C. E. Fisher, Joshua Coit and W. H. Davis, D.D.

The week following Commencement the faculty will join their Presbyterian brethren at San Anselmo in celebrating the latter's quarter-centennial, Professor Mooar delivering the fraternal address. In May the two faculties are to hold a theological institute, delivering up-to date lectures, each to be followed by discussion.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS

ILL.—The 31st annual meeting of the Aurora Association took place April 13, 14, in the New England Church, Aurora, and was well attended. The churches were represented by pastor and two delegates. The different benevolent societies were considered and the question asked, What can be done to relieve their financial distress? The condition of the churches was also carefully considered. Rev. W. H. Day spoke in behalf of the American Missionary Association and Secretary McMillen for the Sunday School Society. The topics included: Half the Truth a Failure, Christian Fellowship, Sixteen Years of Christian Endeavor, What Can We Do to Multiply Accessions to the Church? Is the Sunday School Fulfilling Its Mission as a Bible-Teaching Agency? Chief Obstacles in the Way to Persons Becoming Christians. The papers were vigorous and able and provoked lively discussions. Written reports from the churches, limited to five minutes each, were given and were chiefly encouraging.

NEB.—The Republican Valley Association held its semi-annual session at Cambridge, Rev. John Foster, pastor, April 14, 15. Rev. H. L. Preston preached the sermon. An instructive blackboard exercise on The Characteristic Principles of Congregationalism and an open parliament upon revival work were interesting features. Sunday school work, Christian education and home missions received generous consideration. The woman's hour was one of unusual interest, the work of both home and foreign missions being ably presented. The abundant hospitality of the Cambridge people, the excellent music furnished by the choir and the ever helpful hand of the pastor added much to the enjoyment of the meeting.

Frank Park and although the church is not wealthy it is hoped that means will be found for a new building.

MIMA.—For four or five years Rev. A. L. Seward and his wife have been living at this retired village, doing such Christian work as they could at this and outlying points, gathering in each place a little congregation and Sunday school. Three of these have had to be turned over to other denominations to care for, as available missionary resources would not permit of enlarged work, even though a Congregational church of 25 members could have been organized in one place and one of 15 in another. At Mima, as Mr. Seward was planning to remove to California, several of his neighbors asked for baptism. In a few days others requested the same, desiring also that a church might be formed. The Holy Spirit had been working in the hearts of the entire community, and 29 persons entered into covenant March 29, having previously adopted the Council Manual as their basis of organization. No special meetings have been held but these results have come from faithful, persevering S. S. work, with such occasional preaching services as with the arduous manual labor necessary to the family support Mr. Seward could prepare for.

WOODSTOCK.—First, now 11 years old, numbers 300 members, and is growing steadily. The fine stone building is in the center of the town. The church is practically out of debt, $7,000 having been left it by a wealthy member who died recently. April 11 Rev. A F. MacGregor reviewed the four years of his ministry; over 80 persons had united with the church, and $8,095 had been contributed to the work.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, APRIL 16

The familiar hymn, "When I survey the wondrous cross," fitly opened the Good Friday meeting. Mrs. C. L. Goodell presided and spoke of the multitude who have been studying the life of our Lord the last few weeks, discovering new hights and depths. She called attention especially to Christ's predictions concerning his own death, and to the singing of the hymn before going out into the Mount of Olives. When he told them of his final sacrifice four times he repeated the prediction and they seemed not to comprehend. How much are we losing in this busy age by not listening to the words of our Lord? We would be glad to know about the hymn that was sung. Who was its author? Probably it was a Psalm. Shall we sing it in heaven? With Gethsemane and Calvary in sight our Lord saw the eternal glory which awaited him and could sing. May we not bring hymns of praise out of all our experiences?

Following the same line of thought, Mrs. Judson Smith spoke of the comfort found in the midst of sorrow by the assurance that we may be partakers in Christ's sufferings, and that he upon the cross opened the door of heaven to every son of man. Miss Washburn quoted from a recent letter from Mrs. Howland of Guadalajara, "I believe there are rare gifts of spiritual insight waiting for those who are ready to accept them, and that an indwelling Christ will transform even the barrenest life"; also, "I am sure that by keeping close to Christ and studying his Word one will be led to new experiences, yet be 'kept' in the right path."

The calendar for the entire week being devoted to the American College for Girls at Constantinople, Miss Stanwood gave information concerning the college and its faculty. Owing to the condition of the country the attendance is smaller than usual. Miss Patrick, the president, has been absent the last few months, and her responsibilities have been borne by Miss Fensham, the dean. Miss Olmstead is at present in this country. A pleasant coincidence was a letter received at the rooms that morning from Mr. William C. Chapin, whose name will always be associated with the noble gift of Barton Hall to the college. He wrote of recent experiences in his acquaintance with some graduates of the institution who have come to this country, and who are an honor to the teaching and general influence of the college.

Miss Kara-Ivanova was then introduced, a Bulgarian young woman, who graduated at the college in 1892, then taught there for three years, and has since been studying in the training school at Northfield. With intense feeling and thorough appreciation, she spoke of her alma mater and the opportunities which it furnishes and of the work which the graduates go out to undertake. Miss E. M. Stone had known Miss Kara-Ivanova in Bulgaria, and gave interesting incidents concerning the father and mother, and expressed an interesting thought which had come to her attention, that there are no inferior nations, although there are inferior civilizations. Devotional services were led by Mrs. Noyes, Mrs. Kellogg, Mrs. Daniels and Mrs. Capron, and the meeting closed with the hymn, "In the cross of Christ I glory."

FROM THE HAWKEYE STATE

The selection of Hon. James Wilson as Secretary of Agriculture is pleasing to Iowa, and calls forth more than State pride. Our people recognize his special fitness for the place. He is a man of the people, a great commoner, and he is familiarly known throughout the State. The past few years he has been professor of agriculture in the Iowa State Agricultural College, and under his direction many experiments valuable to the farmer have been made.

The special course of lectures given at Iowa College by Dr. Washington Gladden was highly enjoyed and inspiring to his large audiences. The speaker grasps the real difficulties in the industrial situation, and he is wise in his suggestions concerning the remedy. Altogether the college has had a prosperous year.

It is known that the Junior Endeavor Society had its origin at Tabor, Io., during the pastorate of Rev. J. W. Cowan. The first superintendent was Miss Belle Smith, who was a teacher in Tabor College, and who has won greater renown as the author of the famous poem, If I Should Die Tonight. This little poetical gem has had a remarkable history. First published in the Christian Union in June, 1873, with proper credit, it has since then had perhaps a score or more claimants, but research fails to reveal documentary evidence in favor of the claims. The question of authorship is likely to be discussed in the years to come as in the past, but the evidence all points in one direction, and a modest, Christian woman should not be deprived of the honor that belongs to her.

The last few months have seen a number of changes in Iowa pastorates. Rev. C. H. Rogers has won the hearts of the people at Mason City, and the outlook for that important church is bright. Rev. F. G. Wilcox is pushing the work at Manson with his usual vigor. Rev. D. P. Breed has pleased the church at Creston so well that it has called him to be permanent pastor. April seems especially prolific in ministerial changes. Rev. S. J. Beach closes a ten years' pastorate at Cedar Falls, and Rev. F. E. Carter a four years' pastorate at Clear Lake. Both brethren have built neat houses of worship and had successful pastorates. Rev. A. D. Kinzer, after six years of earnest work at Perry, in which he was greatly blessed, takes up the work at Lyons. Rev. J. D. Mason closes work at Forest City, where he has served the people at two different times. A Minneapolis church has called Rev J. B. Mather, much to the regret of the Garner church. Rev. J. C. Stoddard closes his work at Primghar and begins work at Britt, and Rev. D. E. Skinner of Nora Springs takes up the work at Primghar. Many of our churches have had seasons of refreshing. Hampton, under the leadership of Rev. J. W. Ferner, has recently dedicated a new house of worship, and is in the midst of a great revival. The churches of New Hampton have also been greatly quickened. At Rockford a quiet work of grace has been going on, and a good number has been added to the church. Rev. E. L. Ely is the pastor.

Rev. C. A. Towle has completed ten years' work as superintendent of the Sunday school work in Iowa. He is an efficient worker, and has seen many evidences of progress. The Sunday schools have increased from 210 to 346. The membership has grown from 26,000 to 35,000, and the benevolences have more than doubled. Some Sunday schools have developed into strong churches.

Shall Iowa legalize the manufacture of liquor within her borders? This is the question that is troubling the temperance people of the State. The House has passed such a bill, but the Senate has not yet taken action upon it. It is thought that the fate of the bill depends upon the vote of one man.

PARTRIDGE—In Redlands, Cal., Apr. 2, Edwin F. Partridge, formerly of Philadelphia, Pa., in the 64th year of his age. Interment at Redlands.

SMITH BARTLETT GOODENOW

Was born at Damariscotta, Me., May 16-17, 1817, and died at Battle Creek, Io., March 26, aged nearly eighty years. Left fatherless when a child, at ten he made his home with relatives at Providence, R. I., to receive better educational advantages. He there prepared for college, entered Colby University, thence into the Senior Class of Bowdoin College, where he graduated. He spent a few years in teaching, at the same time reading theology under the supervision of Rev. Ray Palmer, and was ordained in June, 1843, over the churches of Westerly and River Point, R. I. He labored at Milford and Edgartown, Mass., then as city missionary at Newark, N. J. He was pastor at Saugerties-on-the-Hudson, and subsequently at Rockville, Ct. In 1862 he came West, took charge of the church at Waterloo, Io., then spent three years in the editorial chair during the period of war and reconstruction. Then he preached at Earlville, Chandlerville and Roseville, Ill. In 1880 he retired to his homestead at Battle Creek, Io. Since that time he has preached only a little, devoting himself mainly to literary labors.

Mr. Goodenow has been very prolific as a writer and careful as an investigator throughout the whole of his ministerial life. He published in 1843 the New England Grammar and in 1848 the Book of Elements. He has written for the New Englander, Congregational Review and Congregational Quarterly, also largely for the public press, papers and tracts on current topics of interest to the religious public, premium essays on The Sabbath and on slavery, discussions of church polity, etc. In 1874 he published a book entitled Everlasting Punishment Attended with Everlasting Decay, and in 1884 a companion volume, The Pilgrim Faith Maintained. In 1896 he printed an almost exhaustive treatise on Bible Chronology, which cannot fail to be a standard authority on many topics there presented.

He was converted at the age of fourteen, and set himself at once at Christian work which led him into the ministry. He was married in 1839 to Miss Sarah E. Lang of Brunswick, Me., who died in 1851, the mother of six children, of whom two now survive. In 1853 he married Miss Caroline Russell Yates, who with her two children now mourn his loss.

Mr. Goodenow was a faithful, hard-working, scholarly man, with high ideals and aspirations for service in the kingdom. He has been quite feeble for several years and, at last, after a brief illness, passed into knowledge of the spirit life, ready and joyful to be with his Master.

A GRAND TOUR THROUGH NORTHERN EUROPE.—Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb's forthcoming tour through Norway (to the western fjords, the North Cape, etc.) and Russia presents many attractive features. The party will sail from New York on one of the White Star steamers, June 9. Persons desirous of making a preliminary tour through Ireland, Scotland and England can sail May 19, and connect with the main party before departing for Norway. There is to be an extended voyage along the Norwegian coast and through the picturesque fjords, and, of course, a visit to the North Cape. The round of travel through Russia is also very comprehensive. A circular giving the details of this and other European tours will be sent by Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, Boston.

POND'S EXTRACT cures all inflammation and bleeding. Avoid dealers who offer base imitations.

A PLEA FOR ORIGINALITY.—Every woman will appreciate the earnest plea for character and a distinctive quality in furniture, which is made today in another column in the announcement of the Paine Furniture Company. This house has certainly lived up to the precepts it preaches. At no other warerooms in this country can the purchaser see so much novelty, originality and striking character in the furniture offered for sale as in the warerooms of this company on Canal Street. The difference between distinctive and commonplace furniture is the same difference as that which exists between a person and a personage.

NEW STYLES.

Most library tables are like the sea, which a well-known Bostonian described as "hopelessly common, except at Nahant."

It is not too much to demand that your Library Table shall have an individuality of its own, that it shall not be hopelessly commonplace, but as full of character as a sideboard or chimney piece was in the old halls of the German barons.

Evidence that such a table is possible may be found in the above engraving. Here is a design which is full of beauty and refinement.

In our immense assortment, comprising nearly four hundred different styles of Hall, Fancy, Center, Tea, Library and Occasional Tables, there are always some designs of unusual merit. Our prices are extremely low.

PRAYER MEETING

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN

Topic, May 2–8. Christian Enterprise. Jonah 3: 1–10.

Christian service demands the use of the same spirit and powers which bring success when applied to other departments of human life. This is a marvelous age in what it has already witnessed of the triumphs of human industry. The great twenty-story buildings, the network of railroads covering the land, the immense combinations of capital, the drive, the inventiveness, the almost merciless competition which characterize commercial life today, all show what can be done when men undertake to accomplish anything tangible and notable along material lines.

Our topic evidently summons us, in full view as we often are of these evidences of enterprise, to import into our Christian lives something of that force, directness and perseverance which are the marks of modern business. We are not, to be sure, to exalt the commercial spirit and methods of the day as worthy of our imitation. There is much in them which might easily shrivel and destroy our Christian lives. But to the extent to which they inspire us to be successes as Christians, to venture upon large undertakings for Jesus, to be thorough in our methods and undismayed by obstacles, to do our work for the Lord in a large and generous fashion, the lessons of modern industry are certainly worth taking to heart. This is what Paul must have had in mind when he counseled his converts to be "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

It is well, also, to remember that Christian enterprise does not consist mainly or even chiefly in great associated endeavors, though they have an important part in bringing in the kingdom of heaven. The Bible shows us that one man, thoroughly obedient and consecrated, is able to initiate and carry out great things for God. Nineveh's arousing, throughout its length and breadth, was due altogether to the straightforward preaching of the prophet Jonah. John the Baptist, crying alone in the wilderness, caused a mighty religious upheaval in Israel. Carey went from a cobbler's bench to claim India for Christ. Mr. Moody has always been, in a way, superior to committees and co-operating organizations, because his own soul has kept on fire with Christian enthusiasm. Covet the reputation of being an enterprising Christian.

Parallel verses: Ex. 34: 21–29; Neh. 4: 6–9; Acts 11: 19–30; 16: 24–33; 2 Tim. 4: 2.

THE CHURCH PRAYER MEETING

Topic, April 25–May 1. The Cultivation of Contentment. 1 Tim. 6: 3–19; Heb. 13: 5–8; Phil 4: 10–20

By deepening trust. In recognizing life as an education and possessions as a stewardship.

[See prayer meeting editorial]

SINCERITY

My soul, art thou sincere? I do not ask if thou art consistent. I have seen the sun upon the mountains while the valleys were still in shade, but I did not call the valleys insincere. I have heard music on the waters when the land was in silence, yet I did not, therefore, say that the land was untrue. I have seen the primrose lift its head when there was no flower to greet it, yet I did not on that account deem it a hypocrite. But is it a painted primrose, an artificial primrose? I can reverence any flower of the heart, however lowly. I can reverence the first bud of its spring, for it tells of the Christ that is to be. I can reverence the last rose of its summer, for it tells of the Christ that has been here, and therefore is not far away. But I cannot reverence the manufactured flower, the paper flower, the waxen flower. I cannot reverence the imitation of the structure when the spirit is not there. The time for figs may not be yet, and there is no blame. But do not paint the fruit before the time. Do not deceive the thirsty traveler by a dream. Do not pretend that thou hast today what waits till tomorrow. Do not seek to shine with more light than is in thee. Thy light may be only a dawn, but God's dawn is better than man's gilding. Be true to thyself, O my soul.—Rev. Dr. George Matheson.

WHY AN INDIAN FAMINE IS SO AWFUL

The average annual income of the Indian population, taking rich and poor together, does not exceed twenty seven rupees per head, that is, about two cents a day. This was the official estimate of Lord Cromer when finance minister of India. The failure of a single harvest causes death from hunger, not only by thousands and tens of thousands, but by hundreds of thousands and millions. This utter helplessness arises from the fact that the ryots possess no reserve store, either of money or food. They not only possess nothing, but the great mass of them possess much less than nothing, being devoid of credit and hopelessly in debt to the money lenders. In the earlier days in India almost every ryot [husbandman], however poor, had an underground store of millet put away, enough to keep his family for a year or two. If these little stores now existed people would not die from the loss of one harvest. But they are now impossible, being swept away by the bailiffs in execution of the decrees of the civil courts which Great Britain has set up in the rural districts.—London Chronicle.

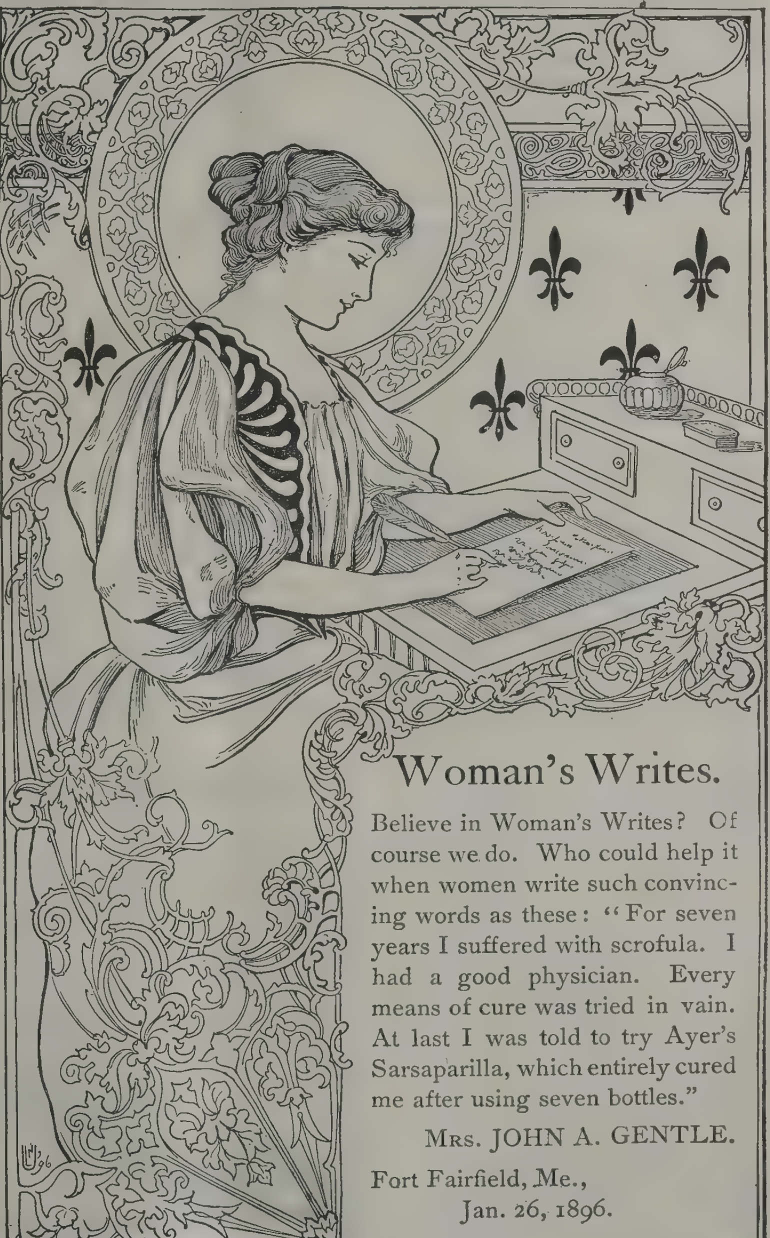
Not long ago Rev. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton of Detroit passed his fortieth birthday anniversary. He celebrated the occasion by preaching a sermon from Acts 4: 22, which, at the request of his congregation, was printed. This is the way life looks to him as he enters the portals of middle age:

> The most royal privilege is in being butler to others' needs. Men never seem, they never are, so Godlike as when upon the flowing tide of some rising distress they sail their frail shallops bravely out to sea to breast the angry billows and rescue impotent spirits. A Nero, sitting in his wonderful palace, surrounded by every luxury of art, of attendance, of appetite, chuckling to himself, "Now I am lodged like as a king should be," is not to be compared with self-impoverished, privilege enriched Paul, writing in the midst of the privations of a frontier missionary tour those epigrammatic words, "As poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, yet possessed of all things."
>
> For some "holy task," for "some great love to serve," the man above forty years old longs and seeks as the most royal privilege of life; with God for his deepest experience, immortality for his ample opportunity, he requires service for his privilege—there is in truth no other.



Woman's Writes.

Believe in Woman's Writes? Of course we do. Who could help it when women write such convincing words as these: "For seven years I suffered with scrofula. I had a good physician. Every means of cure was tried in vain. At last I was told to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which entirely cured me after using seven bottles."

Mrs. JOHN A. GENTLE.

Fort Fairfield, Me.,
Jan. 26, 1896.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK

No startling improvement can be recorded in the trade situation. There is a little better trade movement, but it is not sufficient to make the croakers desist from croaking. As a matter of fact, railroad earnings are showing moderate increases, and they could hardly do this were not merchandise moving with a little more freedom.

Wholesale and retail merchants say that, while there is no boom, business is more satisfactory than it has been for some time. Retailers in particular state that they are moving goods from their shelves and counters in quite respectable volume. Prices, too, on many commodities show an advancing tendency. The large imports may be stimulated by the approaching change in the tariff, but not altogether, and they demonstrate that the consumptive demand of the American people is once more rising to normal proportions.

Wall and State Streets are the bluest spots in the country. The recent Supreme Court decision in the trans-Missouri case and the repeated attacks on corporations in the various State legislatures have given capitalists and the men on 'Change a bad chill. They will not permit themselves to see or recognize what improvement there is in general business.

Dry goods continue slow, but the recent big auction sale is regarded by most as favorable, all things considered. The wool market is more quiet, but prices have lost none of their firmness. Iron and steel are dull and Bessemer pig and billets are lower. Shoe manufacturers are busy, as are also woolen mills. Lumber and building materials are quite active.

THE PERILS OF MODERN INDUSTRY

Supposing that every employer used what the lawyers call reasonable care, and that every workman did the same, the conditions of industry would still expose the worker to constant risk. The shunter who runs about with a bit of bread and meat in one hand and a shunting-hook in the other will jump back too late one day. The bottom may come out of the glass furnace and the blower be caught by the molten metal; or the top of the blast furnace may fall in and the workman with it. The mill girl's hair or dress gets caught in the machinery. The boy who makes tin boxes at a copper or two the gross has his fingers chopped off in his haste to beat the record and win the foreman's approval. The quarryman is smashed by a fall of rock, the miner by a fall of coal. The sailor slips from the rigging. The corn porter slips as he shoots the sack overside into the barge, and he goes after it. The shipwright or the boilermaker falls from the greasy staging into the dry dock. The mechanic who has adjusted the belt a thousand times is caught in the shafting at last. The boy in the paper-mill gets his hand between the rollers. The chemical worker falls into the caustic pot. The printer's laborer who can climb like a monkey about the great Hoe machines catches his foot or his hand in the moving maze of wheels. Every doctor in the laboring districts, every hospital in the great working centers could give you such cases by the score.—London Chronicle.

Great preachers do not constitute great churches, though they may be the instrument of their creation and quickening. Great churches are those in which the rank and file, catching and returning the inspiration of their leaders, fulfill the duties and spread the sympathies of piety and brotherhood.—Rev Charles A. Berry.

HAPPY HEARTS IN BITLIS

Just as we were sending away our last post the belated incoming one came to hand, bringing Dr. Barton's letter informing us that $1,000 from The Congregationalist's fund had been remitted to us for the orphan cause, moreover, Dr. Herrick from Constantinople informs us of $2,000 from the same fund, which we suppose must be additional.

What shall we say? How can we express the gratitude that wells up in thousands of hearts for such a kind benefaction towards this most unfortunate class in this darkest part of the dark land of Kurdistan? Heaven bless the kind donors for this remembrance! But I will leave over thanks and demonstration to a future day, when more sparkling eyes and young, cheery hearts are gathered to prompt uplifting hands as a sign of their deep gratitude.

Before any money was in hand for this object proper, we had received several most forlorn little ones into our girls' boarding school. The case of one of these especially touched my heart, and I could but provide for her, though it be from my own bread. A tiny little thing as she was, her brothers, older, felt she must not be left in the street, so they lock her into her lonely corner while they go off in search of some pittance to bring home to share with their bright-eyed sister, whose only variety for the livelong day is to look through the grates of the window at passers-by or nibble at the bit of bread by her. This so neglected, hampered, shut in of God's little ones has become the firstling in the orphanage plant.

But now that money is coming in, you should see the hurry and enthusiasm manifested in seeking to get the lists made out here and in the villages and buildings with supplies made ready for the little strangers. Our plan is to receive 100 at present, and we hope to accommodate them in our two high school buildings. In this way we can save rent and so make the money go farther.

HARPOOT REJOICES ALSO

Rev. H. N. Barnum, D. D., writes from Harpoot under date of Feb. 17.

The Congregationalist has rendered a splendid service for the poor Armenian orphans. The first $500 was sent to us. It was thankfully received, and it has gone on its errand of mercy. If we have not sent special thanks it has not been because we have not thanked you in our hearts. You can well understand that the dreadful events of the past months have added greatly to our burdens. The sympathy which our friends have shown to this poor, stricken people, and their readiness to help us, have been a source of unspeakable comfort and encouragement. The Lord bless them, every one!

The country is still in a very unsettled condition. The future is uncertain. Even the Turks do not know what to expect. They still threaten the Armenians with extermination, especially if there is forcible European intervention. When is this question to have a solution, and what will it be? I tell the Armenians sometimes that no race was ever the subject of so much prayer as they, hence they should be a holy people.

BIOGRAPHICAL

REV. JOHN DOLBER EMERSON

Rev. J. D. Emerson of Biddeford, Me., died suddenly of the grip, April 12, at Acton, where he was supplying the pulpit. He was born May 29, 1828, at Candia, N. H., graduated at Dartmouth in 1853, at Andover in 1858, and was ordained Oct. 1, 1858, at Haverhill, N. H., where he ministered till November, 1868. He held pastorates at Biddeford, Me., Underhill and Jericho, Vt. He supplied at Kennebunkport, from 1883 to 1888, living at Biddeford. He leaves a widow and several children, the oldest Rev. Stephen Emerson of California. He was an excellent Greek and Latin scholar, and many sermons and memorials from his pen have been published.

HENRY W. BLAKE

A valuable Congregational layman and one highly esteemed in the Connecticut Valley was Mr. Blake, whose death occurred at Springfield, April 13. The son of Rev. Henry B. Blake, he was born in Coventry, Ct., July 20, 1848, and graduated from Williams in 1871. He was associated for a time with General Armstrong at Hampton, but his chief life work was done as a journalist. For ten years he was a member of the Springfield Republican staff and for the last seven years was editor of the Kindergarten News. He was always prominent in Christian activities and at the time of his death was a deacon of the Park Church.

AN extraordinary premium offer of the Babyhood Publishing Company appears in another column of this issue. Babyhood is too well known as the standard mother's nursery guide to require an extended description. It has been for more than twelve years of great value to young mothers who wish to give their children the best training, physically, mentally and morally. The offer now made is a most liberal one. Every article is one of value and certain to be appreciated in any home.

There are times when the variation of a pulse beat tells the practiced physician whether the scale will go down and mean death or up and mean life. But suppose the medicine he prescribes is not the medicine which your child is taking, but something the druggist thought would do just as well! Who is going to regulate the balance then? A druggist who will offer you something else when you ask for Scott's Emulsion will do the same thing with his prescriptions. Get what you ask for!

becomes a pleasing occupation; provided it was stitched on a Singer Automatic. The elastic seam made by this machine is perfectly safe when locked, but can be taken apart in an instant when unlocked. Thus its use is especially desirable for the clever woman who wishes to make over a garment so that it may conform to the changing styles. Whether in the hands of the amateur or the expert, this simple bit of mechanism is the most convenient and effective of any.

Having all the advantages claimed for other "automatic" sewing machines, the Silent Singer has many points of preference that can easily be demonstrated by comparison. Of faultless construction and finish, it is absolutely the lightest-running, the simplest and most compact. It is more easily threaded, and its parts are better protected from dust. The broad treadle better promotes the health and comfort of the operator, because it is lower and the position of the feet can be changed at will. These points are worthy careful consideration by those of delicate health or unaccustomed to continuous use of a sewing machine.

who in 1853 revolutionized the whole system of Cod Liver Oil manufacture by the introduction of the "steam process," has now introduced a new method which is as superior to the steam process as that was to the old and crude methods. By the new process the Oil is kept free from impurities, and does not come in contact with the atmosphere at any time during the manufacture. Moller's

DEATH OF HENRY D. HYDE

Mr. Hyde has been for so long a time a prominent figure in the life of Boston, and active in many directions, that his somewhat unexpected death last Saturday morning removes one who has been counted on as a stanch supporter and promoter of many interests. He was born in Southbridge, April 27, 1838, graduated from Amherst in 1857, and after studying law at Harvard was admitted to the bar in July, 1864. His career as a lawyer has been conspicuous. His uncommon business ability coupled with his astute legal talents made him a valuable adviser in the initiation and consummation of large commercial undertakings. There was a period in his life when he was prominent in political circles, being in 1878 and 1879 a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, and in 1876 a delegate to the National Republican Convention. Before that time he had been prominent in Boston municipal affairs.

Mr. Hyde was a director of a number of important institutions. He has been for years an active trustee of both Amherst and Mt. Holyoke Colleges, and he established at the latter institution the popular Hyde oratorical prize. His church relations in this city were first with the Shawmut Church, during Dr. Webb's pastorate, where he was a deacon for a number of years. A few years ago he transferred his relations to the Old South Church. He rendered good service to the denomination in a number of ways. Particularly skillful was his leadership at the meeting of the American Board in Worcester in 1893, when, as chairman of the large committee appointed by Dr. Storrs to bring to an end if possible the unhappy controversy over Mr. Noyes, he succeeded in so presenting the case that a way of peace was at once opened. Others, of course, had a very large part in the affair, but Mr. Hyde's share will not be forgotten. His funeral was conducted at the Old South Church last Tuesday afternoon, Rev. George A. Gordon, D. D., officiating.

PENALTY OR REFORM

Michael Davitt, who knows whereof he speaks, because he is one who has suffered in prison for political crimes, writes thus concerning the effect of prison administration which is purely penal:

> All individuality is mercilessly suppressed in the prisoner. No prisoner is allowed to do anything except with the permission and in sight of a warder. He is the object of constant and ceaseless vigilance from sentence to liberation. He is closely watched when at prayers in chapel. He is under the warder's eye while in his cell, and is never for a second lost sight of while at work. He is made to feel in every particular of his routine life of silence and labor that he is treated not as a man, but as a mere disciplined human automaton. To possess a will or to attempt to exercise it even in some praiseworthy or harmless manner, as, for instance, to share a piece of bread with a more hungry fellow unfortunate, is to commit a breach of the prison rules. The human will must be left outside of the prison gates, where it is to be picked up again five, seven or fifteen years afterwards, and refitted to the mental conditions which penal servitude has created in the animalized machine which is discharged from custody. All initiative has been enervated under a remorseless discipline, and a man, weak in mental and moral balance at best, is turned out into a cold, repelling and pitiless world, crippled in all those qualities of self reliance which are the essential needs of a creature destitute of friends and liable to be a prey to the ticket-of leave hunters of the law. The system which reduces a man to a condition of moral helplessness of this kind may be scientific, "just," punitive and all the rest, but it is not, and cannot possibly be, reformative, any more than it can be merciful, Christian or considerate.
> It is not in the nature of things human to expect sentient, reflective beings, no matter how degraded by crime, to be cured of their moral maladies through the media of inhuman submission, or to be too deeply impressed with respect for a law which penalizes almost every natural faculty in a prisoner in retaliation for his offense against society. Working on such lines, on the lines of greatest resistance, it is no wonder that penal servitude is a fruitful nursery of recidivism and a patent instance of expensive failure.

Wealth can no longer rest on a supposed ordinance of the Almighty distributing the lots of men. It can no longer rest on unquestioning belief in natural right. It is called upon to justify its existence on rational grounds. It must make itself felt in beneficence. It must avoid that ostentation of luxury which is galling to the hearts of the poor. It must remain at its post of social duty. If rich Americans in the hour of peril, instead of remaining at their posts of social duty and doing according to their measure what Peter Cooper did, continue to crowd in ever-increasing numbers to the pleasure cities and haunts of Europe, or spend their money at home in selfish luxury and insidious display, a crash will come and ought to come.—Goldwin Smith.

OUR CHURCH COVENANT

In almost every church there are members who habitually neglect their covenant vows. Often these persons are good neighbors and in many respects estimable citizens. It is charitable to suppose they do not realize that they are untrue to obligations which they have voluntarily, publicly and solemnly assumed. Are the more faithful members keeping their covenant vows while they live with these neglectors without reminding them of their neglect? Perhaps a wisely worded letter may be helpful in many of these cases, at least as an introduction to personal interviews. Here is an extract from such a letter, written by a pastor to his people at the beginning of the year:

> It is not a cause for pride, but rather for honest searchings of heart, to remember that the church membership is the heart of the moral and spiritual life of a whole parish. "Walking in wisdom towards those who are without," demands of us that we be faithful not only to our covenant with God, but also to our covenant with the church. This covenant is a formal thing, yet upon loyalty to it depends the very existence of the church, with its services and sacraments. Some of us, without any evident reason, appear to be living in entire disregard of the covenant with the church. "But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, . . . though we thus speak."

CAUSES OF SUICIDE

The increase of deaths self-inflicted has become startling. The record of them has become so common in the daily press that the propriety of passing laws preventing the publication of detailed descriptions of suicide is being discussed. In the Washington Post Hon. Elijah A. Morse discusses some of the causes of self-murder, and one of the most prominent of these, he believes, is the book written by Col. R. G. Ingersoll, which appears to justify and recommend suicide. Mr. Morse says:

> What would be thought of the public sale of a book recommending and justifying arson, or rape, or murder? And yet here is a book that has been allowed to be freely sold, recommending and justifying self-murder. The old book—the Bible—has been a joy and a comfort to God's people in ages that are past, and will be in the ages to come. The disciple of Jesus gets out the old book and reads: "When thou passeth through the waters I will be with thee, and the floods they shall not overflow thee." When he is in trouble he learns that "there is a balm in Gilead, and there is a great physician that is near" that Mr. Ingersoll knows not of. What substitute does he offer us for this old book? Why, the book I have mentioned, recommending and justifying suicide. When you are in trouble get a pistol and blow your brains out, or turn on the gas and asphyxiate yourself. How do you like the substitute? No, Mr. Editor, that is a wicked and bad book, and, in my opinion, has much to do with the present alarming epidemic of suicides, and if there was any constitutional way to reach it its sale should be forbidden by law.

OUR AGRARIAN PROBLEMS

I am convinced that there is no agricultural disease. That is, there is no political condition which is peculiar to agriculture and which can be remedied by legislation. By reason of their inherent conservatism, the agricultural people have not yet adjusted themselves to the recent social and economic movements, and they have not fully assimilated the knowledge and impulses of the time; and I am also convinced that grave errors have been committed in forcing the development of Western lands. If these general conclusions are sound, then it follows that the solution of our agrarian difficulties is to be sought in better education. By education I mean literally what I say, by means of a general waking up, a shaking out of all the old habits of thought, an injection of new conceptions of life, an intellectual stirring up of every rural community. I do not mean the simple giving of information, the cramming in of carefully assorted facts. We need to shake out the snarls and kinks of prejudice and indifference before giving great attention to the dissemination of more direct information. There is already enough popular knowledge of better agricultural methods to greatly improve our rural conditions, if only the farmers would assimilate it and apply it.—Professor Bailey of Cornell University.

A NATIONAL SHORTCOMING

It has always struck me that it is a national defect in our American character that we are always viewing things by sidelights and afterthoughts; that, when our minds are made up, or ought to be made up, as to what to do or to say according to the best instructions of conscience, of interest, of good feeling, we begin to be troubled by fears, by doubts, by considering too curiously how ourselves or others may be affected by some secondary, some indirect result—we are, as it were, always looking over one or the other shoulder to see if angel or demon cannot offer some suggestion which shall modify our sincere and single minded emotions and convictions. I do not mean that these afterthoughts are necessarily base or cruel; they constantly arise from tenderness of conscience, from delicate regard for others, but they defeat their own object, even when it is most valuable—"the native hue of resolution is sicklied o'er" by these sidelong tremors and doubts, our action is impeded by the very thoroughness of our reflections and motives, and we stand at a positive disadvantage with men of other countries because, when they know what to say and do, they go ahead and do it without considering too curiously what may result.—Hon. William Everett.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST

Boston Thursday 29 April 1897

In connection with PARABLES IN PICTURES, Part V., in Home Department.

God·be·merciful·to·me

Rev. F. A. NOBLE, D. D., Chicago, Ill.—"It is a book to quicken loyalty to the Pilgrim faith, and inspire zeal in our Christian work."

Rev. WM. ELLIOT GRIFFIS, D. D.—"In literary proportion, in clearness of statement, in emphasis laid upon things vital and in putting into shade (the proper place) unimportant details, as well as in general spirit of candor and clearness, the book shows the marks of one who has made himself familiar with the Congregational household in America and has earnestly and conscientiously supplied a real want."

Dr. Dunning's
CONGREGATIONALISTS IN AMERICA.

A POPULAR History of the Origin, Belief, Polity, Growth, and Work of our Denomination.

With Introductions by R. S. Storrs, D. D., and Gen. O. O. Howard, LL. D., and special chapters by Dr. J. E. Roy, Dr. A. H. Quint, Dr. F. E. Clark, and Rev. H. A. Bridgman. 552 pp., with numerous portraits and illustrations. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt top.

Full of information of value not only to Congregationalists but to all students of American History, inasmuch as early Congregationalism is so interwoven with Colonial history that one can hardly be understood without a knowledge of the other.

FOR SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE MAY

"There is something about Scribner's which one does not find in the other magazines of the day. It seems to have a progressive spirit back of it."—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

The May number has a cover design in 9 colors by M. Gorguet.

Sixteen of the illustrations are made from life by W. H. Hyde, who spent several months at Cambridge for the purpose.

The strongest piece of writing RICHARD HARDING DAVIS ever did is his description of the storming of the palace and the flight of the president's wife in "Soldiers of Fortune" for this month.

C. D. GIBSON has made a study of "THE DRAWING ROOM" for his May London sketches and notes. This is the first time an American artist has pictured a presentation at court from life.

"THE WORKING OF A BANK," by CHARLES D. LANIER, tells the whole story from the president to the watchman who guards the vaults. This is the original article on banking as announced last year.

The 24 illustrations of this, as of the other articles in "THE CONDUCT OF GREAT BUSINESSES" series, are by special artists who were taken behind the scenes.

"GOLF" is taken up by H. J. WHIGHAM (the amateur champion of this country), who writes sanely about it.

"LORNA DOONE" is the subject of this month's frontispiece. It is W. HATHERELL'S contribution to the "Scenes from Great Novels" collection.

W. D. HOWELLS'S "STORY OF A PLAY" continues.

"The Best Books of the World"

MAX MÜLLER'S Fine Word on What is Really Immortal in Literature.

The memorable attempt made by Sir John Lubbock, a few years ago, to draw up a list of the Hundred Greatest Books of the World, spoke to a deep human passion, the desire and the aspiration to know the best that has been written and spoken by those whom Emerson calls "the great voices of Time."

But when it came to actually making out such a schedule of "the chiefest hundred," it was found there was almost as great a variety of opinion as there were books to name. "What is called gold by one critic is called rubbish by another." No two could agree.

When Mr. Ruskin got through putting his pen "lightly through the needless—and blottesquely through the rubbish and poison of Sir John's list," there was not a great deal left of it. Prof. James Bryce, whose fine work on "The American Commonwealth" makes his opinion of especial weight with us, wished to change almost every other line. The poet Swinburne made an entirely different catalogue, and the late William Morris contrived yet another that was wholly and wonderfully his own. Bookman and statesman, theologian and man of science, poet and novelist, each had his special set of names without which such a list would not be worth a moment's while! So that if we were to add up all the books proposed in the course of this very interesting discussion, for this "indispensable library," we should have not a hundred but much nearer to a thousand "greatest books."

The plain fact of the matter is that it is impossible to draw up a list of no more than a hundred volumes, which will not contain works which many readers find dull, flat, stale, and unprofitable, while leaving out many others that might prove the inspiration and the delight of their lives. Moreover as much harm may result from making a fetich of the "classics" as from neglecting them altogether. How many, of this day, have in their heart of hearts thanked gruff old Doctor Johnson for bluntly calling "Paradise Lost" a tiresome book?

Altogether the sanest word in the whole discussion—so it appears to us as we have recently been re-reading the little volume in which the various letters and lists were printed—were spoken by Prof. Max Müller of Oxford when he said that he found "few books that are supremely great from beginning to end," while on the other hand there are parts and passages or whole poems which he could read "again and again, wondering more and more, every time, how one man could have written them."

"If I were to tell you," wrote the great philologist, "what I really think of 'the hundred best books,' I am afraid you would call me the greatest literary heretic, or an utter ignoramus. Take the greatest poet of antiquity, and if I am to speak the truth, I must say there are long passages even in Homer which seem to me extremely tedious. Take the greatest, or at all events one of the greatest poets of our century, and again I must confess that not a few of Goethe's writings seem to me not worth a second reading. There are gems in the most famous, there are gems in the least known of poets, but there is not a single poet, so far as I know, who has not written too much, and who could claim a place for all his works in what might be called a Library of World Literature."

MAX MULLER

Nothing, it seems to us, could better describe the practical futility of Sir John's attempt; and nothing on the other hand could emphasize more strongly at once the need and the high value of what Max Müller calls a "Library of World Literature"—such a library as would bring together, in a convenient number of volumes, and at a price within the purchasing power of the great reading public, just those single poems, those great parts of great books—"the immortal part of their most mortal bodies"—which, as this famous Oxford critic says, "make it seem a very miracle that they could have been composed by man."

It is because Charles Dudley Warner's Library, now in course of publication, seems to us to meet just this need so fully and so finely that we have given it the welcome we have. We have already spoken in terms of high praise of this splendid work, but as the succeeding volumes come from the press our estimate of its value deepens and broadens.

It goes almost without saying that such a work would be next to valueless if it were not done by the most trained and competent hands. Mr. Warner's new work, however, edited by the ablest, and its critical portions written by the most eminent of living men of letters, is a truly notable enterprise—one of the most important literary undertakings of the century. This new library, we feel more and more, must rank in the field of literature as does the Encyclopedia Britannica among the arts and sciences.

First of all, it accomplishes vastly more than could any set list of the Hundred Best Books, even though such a list were to be extended to a thousand. It is not mere dry compilation, it is very far from being simply a "collection of literature." It does indeed give, in a most marvelous way, that which is most vital, enduring, and truly representative of the greatest writers, not merely the poets and novelists, but the historians, the dramatists, the biographers, the essayists, the men of science, neglecting not a single field in the wide domain of printed books.

But this, great and valuable service as it is, seems almost subsidiary or at least but a part of the broad purpose of this monumental work.

Mr. Warner's chief idea, apparently, has been exposition and interpretation; he has given not merely what we wish to read of an author's own writings, but he has prefaced all of these by a remarkable series of critical articles, telling the circumstances under which the book was written, giving a succinct but often wonderfully vivid story of the author's life, so to speak fixing his place in the perspective of time, so that we read not at random, but with our path lit from the lamps of the widest and finest scholarship of the day.

The plan of Mr. Warner's library seems to us simply ideal. We can conceive of no other possible means by which such a vast variety of the most interesting information and the most entertaining reading, together with such a clear and splendid sweep of the whole field of literature since writing began, could be compacted or in any wise gotten into thirty convenient volumes. And in the execution of this bold and entirely unique design Mr. Warner has gathered together such an array of eminent men—the foremost writers of Europe and America—as was, we believe, never before engaged in a single literary undertaking.

The latest volumes of the new library which have come to our desk renew and emphasize the impression we first gained, that so fine is the work here being done it will never be done over again in so magnificent a way. It is, in a word, the one standard work which gathers and preserves for each individual or family "that which is best and most enduring in the literature of the world."

But after all this is said it seems next to impossible to convey any adequate idea of the true literary charm and the deep human interest of every paragraph and page we have yet read, and the amazing range and variety of the subjects covered. We conceive that this superb Library, when complete, will form the finest and most instructive History of Literature that has yet been published in any tongue. It will be not only a delightful introduction to the study of any literature or of any individual author, but at the same time a vast repository in which one may delve endlessly, finding anew each time something to pleasure and profit the passing hour. Even a general knowledge of all that is contained in this really epochal publication would afford a liberal education of the broadest kind. It is a whole university in itself.

When we consider that this new library is a work of permanent and lasting value, comprising the very essence of the world's best literature, together with the finest criticism upon that literature obtainable from modern writers; and when, moreover, we consider that it is possible to secure the thirty volumes of the completed Library for a third of what any set of "a hundred best books" would require, we believe it is just to say that Mr. Warner has done a greater service for the reading public of his time than any other living man. The Library is indeed the ripe fruition of a long and rarely useful life, and will constitute such a monument as any one, however eminent, well might envy.

We call the attention of our readers to an important arrangement which has been made by the publishers with The Harper's Weekly Club of 91 Fifth Avenue, New York, whereby it becomes possible to obtain this superb treasury of literature at a reduced price and upon very easy terms. For the purpose of introducing and advertising the Library, the publishers have arranged to furnish the Harper's Weekly Club with the first edition of the work, printed from the new, clear plates. The first edition is always to be especially desired, and in view of the very considerable saving which can be made in this way, we advise readers to write promptly for particulars. The Club now forming will, we understand, practically exhaust this desirable first edition, and it will be well, therefore, to take advantage of the publishers' offer at once.

A WELCOME aftermath of Lent and Easter is the array of printed orders of service which have been coming to hand during the last week or ten days. They all indicate no little care and labor on the part of pastors to secure for their churches the best results of this special season. Emphasis was naturally laid chiefly upon Holy Week, and we are interested in the variety of topics which different pastors have drawn from the gospel record. Some of them are: The Last Day of the Public Ministry, The Day of Conflict, The Day of Authority, The Day of Retirement, The Day of Suffering, The Day in the Tomb. Another analysis of Holy Week assigns to Monday the subject of Superficial Living, to Tuesday Spiritual Living, to Wednesday Secluded Living, to Thursday Serviceful Living; still a third treatment of the same facts proceeds along the line of Some Secrets of Christ on successive days, dwelling on his power, his peace, his joy and his sacrifice. One of our strongest suburban churches on Good Friday evening was deeply impressed by the rendition of Stainer's cantata of The Crucifixion, and another held five or six services during the day, a specially attractive one being that for business men at quarter past seven in the morning. In some cases the help of neighboring pastors or of ministers from a distance was brought into requisition on the evenings of Holy Week and such stirring themes as the Misuse of Spiritual Opportunities, The Sins of Omission and Christ's Vital Union with His People were considered. Reviewing the Lenten season as a whole, we are glad to record the good results achieved. Certainly the Minnesota church which proposed that on each Sunday in Lent a self-denial offering for home missions in that State be laid aside to be presented on Easter morning discerned the altruistic uses of the season as well as those which make for the deepening of the individual Christian life.

Every friend of home missions and home missionaries is in duty bound to read carefully and prayerfully the statement we publish this week on page 626 from the executive committee and officers of the Congregational Home Missionary Society. Not less should each one reflect that on him rests a portion of the responsibility for a work which appeals to him with peculiar necessity in view of the probable receipts of the coming summer months. Our home missionaries live on meager salaries. Most of them have no other source of income. The question whether they are to have food to eat, or are to abandon their fields because they are abandoned by their friends, is one which must soon be settled by many of them. We hope every one who proposes to give to the Home Missionary Society this year will, if possible, send in his contribution within the next three months.

A union meeting composed of churches of the Congregational and Christian denominations was held in St. Louis, Feb. 8, which had important influences in drawing these churches closer together. A second meeting followed, April 19, in the Central Congregational Church of that city, at which papers were presented by Rev. Dr. R. M. Sargent and by Rev. W. W. Hopkins. Rev. Dr. Michael Burnham, who read a paper at the first meeting on Congregational church polity, gave an address on Congregationalism which made a deep impression. The discussions were carried on in a thoroughly fraternal spirit, bringing out the points both of agreement and disagreement between the two bodies. It was suggested that both might co-operate in supporting a children's home, a missionary to the city institutions and in other Christian efforts, also that the publishing houses and denominational papers might furnish points of contact. Three committees were appointed, each composed of two members from each body, to present to the next meeting plans of co-operation in educational, evangelistic and benevolent movements. We hope that better acquaintance, more frequent exchange of pulpits and a wise co-operation in selecting locations for new churches and Sunday schools may result from these meetings. We look to see other similar union gatherings spring from this example in places where several churches of both denominations are in the same neighborhood, and while we do not expect that organic union will follow, at least in this generation, we rejoice in the fellowship thus promoted between those who are followers of the one Lord Jesus Christ.

Our staff letter from India this week tells of the distress there due to famine and plague. Other correspondence at hand from missionaries on the ground confirms the sad story, and beseeches the Christian world to pray for rain and to send help. Already it is clear that the deaths from the great famine of twenty years ago will be outnumbered by millions. The plague has now spread, till it can scarcely fail to affect some eighty millions of people, and it is estimated that one-tenth will be swept away by it. Even the well-to do families have not six months' grain ahead. Starvation, as well as the plague, is now upon the day laborers, who form the bulk of the population and of the Christians. They flock to the missionaries carrying their babies, with small children huddling around them, to appeal piteously for food and for work, and to implore "the Americans" to take their children away and save them from plague and from death, which seems doubly horrible from the burials by the trenchfuls, or from no burial at all. The government has opened "relief works" for these laborers in new roads and tanks, where the poor creatures dig, delve and die by the thousands on the munificent pay of three cents a day to the men, two and a half cents to the women and one and three quarter cents to children.

Why need there be such a vast deal of sickening detail in connection with the description of murders and the apprehension of assassins? No severer accusation can be brought against the new journalism than its disposition by headlines, pictures and sensational writing to spread before the public all the dreadful minutiæ of tragedies, and to keep people apprized of every movement of the apprehended criminal. Who cares what he had for breakfast, or who wants to pry into his heart and scrutinize the play of emotions there? Such journalism is thoroughly baneful and whets the appetite of a certain class in the community for horrors, and in the long run it breeds criminals. No wonder that respectable people are moving toward legislation that will secure immunity from such pabulum for them and their children.

It is not just or kind for those contributing for the relief of sufferers to expect too much in the way of recognition of their gifts. Some friends who have given for the orphans in India and Turkey have been thoughtless enough to lay a heavy burden upon those through whom the gifts have been sent. Miss Shattuck of Oorfa, in replying to one who had asked a letter about the use made of a certain gift, apologizes for the delay by saying that she is so overcrowded with work that it seems next to impossible to obtain even five or six hours of sleep. It is unkind to lay another ounce of burden upon the shoulders of such a laborer as Miss Shattuck. Rev. Dr. C. C. Tracy, president of Anatolia College, Marsovan, sends the following kind remonstrance to thoughtless contributors:

> We ask our friends to suffer from us a word of entreaty. Many are unwilling to help educate young men or women for Christian work, or do anything to support preachers or teachers, unless they can have particular individuals assigned them and carry on correspondence with or concerning them, receive special reports, and so on, all of which adds so much to the weight and complexity of the missionary's cares and does, on the whole, more harm than good. So many will not help us in the work unless we furnish them some such gratification in return. Why make such demands? Must those who support this work have a quid pro quo? Is it noble to give to the Lord and then demand pay of his disciples? When I was a boy we had a missionary society among us children which raised more money for the Board than was raised by the church of which we were children, but instead of special letters and reports from missionaries we read the Missionary Herald and were satisfied. All our friends would gain and not lose if they would do the same.

“The Ben Oliel Mission among the Jews is entirely unworthy of confidence and support. Like so much else in Jerusalem, it deserves to be stigmatized as a fraud.” So writes Rev. Dr. John H. Barrows to the Interior. Mr. Ben Oliel and his family immersed themselves in the Jordan about two years ago, and were widely advertised in Baptist newspapers in this country as new converts to Baptist doctrine. The statement of Dr. Barrows only reiterates what American consuls have said for several years, but there are a good many persons who can forgive almost anything in a Jew who professes conversion, not only to Christianity but to belief in immersion, and who is ready to declare his devotion to any other doctrine which will bring an income to a needy Israelite and his family.

THROUGH MAN TO MEN

God speaks to man through men. It is the human element in the Bible which carries the vital elements of God’s revelation home to the human heart. Whether in record of actual experience, in parable or poem, it is through human nature that man comes to the knowledge of God. Strike from the Old Testament the elements of human experience which it contains, and only a dry residuum of unexplained and unattractive law and precept remains. The Bible is God’s Book. It tells us more of God than all the writings of all the other nations of the earth. But it is God’s Book for man, because what God teaches in its pages is written in the experience of men with God. This is the foreshadowing of the incarnation in the Old Testament Scriptures, which makes them, in spite of their incompleteness, alive with the very life of him in whose person divinity and humanity meet and mingle.

What God wanted for his purpose of revelation to mankind at large was first a man. He walked with God, like Abraham, Moses and Elijah. He sinned and suffered, and still rebelled against God’s will, but God was always at his side. In the truthful picture of such lives all the world may read something of God’s character and purpose. This is the initial inspiration of the Scriptures—God’s presence with a man.

There is nothing in the literary history of the world to compare with the truthful simplicity and deep significance of these life pictures in the Old Testament and the New. There is no exaggeration, no concealment, no flattery. Sometimes the picture is drawn by the man’s own hand, oftener by the hand of another, but the fundamental inspiration is that of a life—a man through whose experience other men shall see what God is, and how he deals with human souls. Each picture taken by itself is an imperfect revelation, but it is a revelation none the less.

It is because of this revelation through the experiences of other men that the use of the imagination is so essential for study and preaching. A preacher who, like Moody, can put himself in the place of Noah, Joseph, Samuel, David, and by the force of his own imagination interpret the spiritual meaning of each life to his hearers, draws very near to God and obtains willing audience from men. Learning can do much to illuminate the Scriptures, but learning without imagination too often leaves men stranded on barren coasts of pedantry. It is the common gift—the imaginative gift—which every healthy child possesses, and to which every human heart responds, to which God has intrusted the keys of spiritual meaning in his Word.

To this primary inspiration God has added a second—that of the writer and compiler. We call it inspiration, but a better word, perhaps, is oversight. Holy men of old spake as they were moved, and other men preserved and selected what God saw fit to use for the permanent instruction of his people. As the lives were selected lives, so the books are selected books. God’s care extended, and is extending, through the ages, so that nothing essential should be lost. The rounding out of the canon, with its necessary compilation, condensation and exclusion, is a part of God’s plan of self-revelation, and here again it is through men that he has spoken. If we believe in the inspiration of the writers, we are compelled to believe that God gave counsel also to those who compiled, arranged and put the stamp of authority upon the books of the canon and no others.

Nor can a third element of God’s personal oversight and inspiration be left out of the account in a full consideration of God’s purpose of self-revelation. The teaching of God’s Spirit is essential to the influence of the Book. He who chose and taught the actors and the makers teaches every one who comes to the reading of the Book with a mind open to its revelation. The sword of the Spirit would cease to be a sword if it left the owner’s hand. A doctrine of God’s oversight which leaves the Book, inspired indeed, but suspended in mid-air, without God’s personal oversight of its contact with the minds of men is misleading and incomplete. The vital pledge of hope for the church is the presence of God’s Spirit in the world today. He did not touch men’s hearts in ancient days to leave their children forsaken. The church of today is the continuation of the church of the living God, whose presence is our right and glory now as much as in the days of old. There are not three inspirations, but only one, continuing from the earliest times and ready always for our need. The same God who gave the Word in days of old makes it quick and powerful still to every human soul that will attend his teaching. Supervision at the beginning foresaw and provided help to the end. It is no disparagement to the Book to say that its validity and authority depend in part upon the living presence of its own author.

A theory of inspiration, therefore, which leaves it wholly in the past, neglects the teaching mission of the Paraclete which Christ has promised as the greatest comfort of the church. We have a right to claim that the same God who gave the Word should help us to interpret it. If we are not chosen to be makers at least we are chosen to be partakers of its wealth, and by the same election which appointed Moses and Isaiah and the apostles to their work.

God revealed himself through man to men. What he had done in part in the Old Testament he brought to perfection in the New, making full revelation in the man Christ Jesus in whom dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. What we know of God we know in its perfection by the study of the life of Jesus interpreted, as it can only be, by our own experience. Christ’s rounded and comprehensive humanity speaks to all stages and conditions of our human intelligence.

Nor is his method, used so long and attested by such wealth of fruit-bearing, discarded in these latter days. God still reveals himself through man to men. The Bible is the Christian’s book, but Christians are the world’s Bible. The witness of God which the world reads most is not a book—it is the daily life of Christians. In us the primary inspiration is repeated and continued. As God chose Enoch in the world before the flood and Abraham and all the other witnesses who served their generation until they fell asleep, so he has chosen us. Every true disciple, by the indwelling of the Holy Ghost, is a revelation of the living God. Every false disciple is like a cloud that hides the sun. God has trusted his own cause to us, and even his own reputation among men. Except by his constant assistance, how shall we be worthy of the trust?

ESTIMATING EVANGELISTIC EFFORTS

The results for good which follow special revival movements intended to affect an entire town or city are not easily estimated. Spiritual impulses, right purposes and exalted lives cannot be tabulated. Conversions can only in part be counted. Every one who is brought near to God in a new experience believes that the work which has brought him that blessing is beyond estimate. The testimonies given in connection with the Moody meetings in Boston showed conclusively that such experiences were numerous. We would not lightly regard any movement which has brought about such results.

Yet the cost of securing these results must also be measured. We may thus learn how to improve the methods of renewing the spiritual life of the churches and of converting sinners. The results of Mr. Moody’s campaign in New York city are being discussed in newspapers by several prominent pastors of that city. Among them are Rev. Dr. R. S. McArthur, who writes for the Watchman, and Rev. W. C. Bitting, who writes for the Chicago Standard. On the one hand they speak of Mr. Moody’s masterly conduct of the assemblies, of the crowded attendance, enthusiastic choirs, of the uplifting and sympathetic spirit of the meetings. They believe that many Christians were helped to a more earnest study of the Scriptures and a deeper devotion to Christ.

On the other hand, they are agreed that no great advantages resulting from those meetings have thus far appeared in the churches. Dr. McArthur says that out of more than twenty pastors only one reports any apparent increase of activity in his church brought about by those who attended the Moody meetings. Dr. Bitting says that one pastor, who had a large list of inquirers placed in his hands, reports that three persons during the winter joined his church who said that they had been affected by the evangelistic services. Out of several hundreds who signed cards expressing a desire to be Christians the first hundred were first investigated. Sixty-four of these were found to be members of white churches. Some apparently had signed by proxy, for they did not know that their names had been taken. Others gave their names because they understood that a book would be given to them. Others wished for a deeper Christian experience. Still others could mention no reason why they had given their names. Of the remaining thirty-six, several were colored, a number of them members of churches. Others could not be found. A few lived out of the city. Out of the hundred there was not one candidate for membership in any church. It is estimated that of the many whose names were distributed among the pastors not more than one in 100 is likely to join the churches.

Some serious disadvantages appear to have followed the meetings. A large number of young people gave their services as ushers and singers on Sundays. Several Bible classes were thus broken up and cannot be reorganized. Offerings for missions and regular church work have been reduced because of urgent appeals to give to the support of the meetings. The evening attendance at churches fell off, owing to the rival attractions of the evangelistic services. Sharp arraignment of churches and pastors, who were often charged with indifference and lack of spiritual life, led many to hold more lightly their obligations to the churches. A marked aversion was found, even in those who professed conversion, to join churches which they had heard often described as spiritually dead. Others who belonged to the churches were made more dissatisfied with institutions which, they were told, so far failed to meet their needs, and were persuaded that they must find places of worship where such a spirit prevails as that in the evangelistic services. Many of these will probably not return to their former fellowship.

These statements of facts are not made in an unkindly spirit by the writers. But they suggest that great meetings in public halls do not fill the place of church services; that evangelists do not do the work of pastors; that the signing of cards expressing a desire to lead a better life is not valid evidence of conversion; and that the sympathetic enthusiasm of crowded assemblies does not necessarily indicate a great religious revival. Some better way ought to be found to bring men to Christ, to strengthen Christian faith and to edify the churches than is shown by meetings conducted to create a revival, even by the most consecrated evangelists.

LOST OPPORTUNITIES OF SERVICE

An opportunity of service is lost when it goes unperceived or neglected. Is it not also often practically lost when only incomplete use has been made of it? Doubtless we rarely realize fully the number and gravity of our shortcomings of either sort, but no sensitive conscience fails to comprehend its obligations to God and one's fellowmen to make honest use of whatever openings for doing good come in its way.

It is possible, however, to lose one's balance a little, to become morbid. There are persons who repel others by a too conspicuous desire to do good. The aim to do services to others unfailingly in order not to forfeit the approval of one's own sense of duty may come even to have some appearance of selfishness. It is more likely to involve the appearance of officiousness and thus to become unpleasant. Only that purpose to make full and proper use of one's opportunities, whether for one's self or for others, commends itself which is natural, sincere, unassuming and considerate. We often undervalue our opportunities of being good as compared with those of what we consider doing good. But the former are apt to be the more valuable and influential, alike to ourselves and to our friends. The smile of some people is more helpful than the gifts of time, money or effort of others, because it really bears more trusty witness to character and spirit. To suppose that we influence those who know us only, or even chiefly, by what we say or do is a mistake. It is what they know us to be that impresses them. Actions and words of course go far, especially when unpremeditated, to indicate the inner feelings, but the real character back of them indefinably but invariably and positively makes itself felt in any case. Our use of opportunities therefore must aim earnestly to make the inner nature what it should be. Any opportunity, whether it relate primarily to others or to ourselves alone, is lost which is so employed as to fail of this result.

We lose opportunities often through timidity, sometimes through ignorance due to our own neglects, most frequently, probably, because of insufficient earnestness. Definite temptation conquers us. Moral sluggishness impedes us. The one sure remedy is to cultivate the watchful, loyal, zealous spirit which Jesus showed. To have the mind of Christ is to be always ready for opportunity. Perhaps there is nothing else by which spiritual progress is rendered more evident than the consciousness that we are learning steadily to perceive and make wise and skillful use of our opportunities, and have to look back from week to week upon fewer which must be accounted lost.

CURRENT HISTORY

Senate and House

The somewhat anomalous attitude as respects the relations of the Senate and the House naturally gives rise to criticisms and rejoinders. Speaker Reed is evidently of the opinion that the Senate might profitably adopt some of his own methods of expediting public business, and sentiment of this sort found expression last week in a vigorous speech from the new senator from Illinois, Mr. Mason. It was his maiden effort and slashed right and left into the traditions of the Senate. Senator Hoar, who has of late been defending the prestige of the Senate, was obliged to take his Republican colleague from Illinois in hand, and in a dignified retort made it clear that he for one was not friendly to any radical revision of the Senate rules. The prospect that when the vote on the arbitration treaty is taken, May 5, a considerable majority against it will be registered is certainly not increasing public respect for the Senate.

The Tariff Bill

With the House in session only intermittently and the Senate not yet entering upon the tariff discussion, congressional affairs for the moment do not entirely engross the attention of the country. The sub committee of the Finance Committee, now handling the Dingley Bill, is reported to be expediting matters as rapidly as possible. With all the conflicting interests to be adjusted, its task is no easy one. The hope now is that the bill will be in the hands of the full committee this week. The general tendency of the revision which the Dingley Bill as it came from the House has already undergone is said to be in the direction of reduction, and there is considerable likelihood that the retroactive clause of the bill will be stricken out as respects woolens and hides. However, the chances favor an increase in duties. New England business interests are solidly against such action, and some of the stanchest Republicans in this section are loud in their protests. The clamor for such an advance comes from the Western senators, and, as the bill can finally pass only with their aid, they are all the more unyielding in their demands.

Appointments

Much interest has been taken in the appointment of the first Assistant Secretary of State, in view particularly of the uncertainty in the public mind respecting Secretary Sherman's attitude and probable procedure on important international questions. Mr. W. R. Day, whom President McKinley has appointed to be Secretary Sherman's chief assistant, is a fellow-townsman of the President's and is considered a man of strength and ability. Ex-Congressman Bellamy Storer gets the appointment of minister to Belgium. The most important Federal office in the State of New York, the postmastership of New York city, falls to Cornelius Van Cott, who held the position during President Harrison's administration. He and other recent appointees to Federal offices in New York are reputed to be Machine men, and presumably thus acceptable to Senator Platt. Another of the more notable appointments of the week was that of Harold M. Sewall of Maine to be minister to the Hawaiian Islands. The minister to Greece has not yet been chosen, but the fitness of Professor Manatt of Brown University for the position ought to prevent much further delay. Unexceptional as many, perhaps most, of President McKinley's appointments thus far have been, it is a pity that there should be such marked concessions to the spoilsmen as have already been evidenced in several instances.

An Important Measure

The passage by the Senate of the Bankruptcy Bill by vote of forty-nine to eight redeemed last week from being a period of total legislative inactivity. It will be remembered that the House some months ago passed the Torrey Bankruptcy Bill, but the public had begun to conclude that it had been side-tracked altogether in the Senate. However, Mr. Nelson of Minnesota puts his vigorous shoulder to the wheel and the expected obstacles not materializing a somewhat speedy and notable victory resulted. This Nelson Bill is somewhat more favorable to the debtor than the Torrey Bill was. It will have to run the gauntlet of the House and inasmuch as no committees have been appointed there its enactment into law may have to suffer considerable postponement, if it does not fail entirely.

Fixing the Responsibility

The investigation into the recent gas explosion at the corner of Tremont and Boylston Streets fixes the responsibility for that disaster on the Boston Gas Light Company, the Boston Transit Commission and the Metropolitan Construction Company. Judge Ely finds that the negligence was gross and inexcusable. The evidence showed that the Gas Light Company did not exercise due care in preventing leaks of gas from its pipes, and that it did not have experienced men at hand to watch for these leaks where it was known that they were liable to break out. The cause of the disaster, Judge Ely says, was "the unlawful acts of the Boston Gas Light Company." Whether or not still other corporations may also be found to have shared in the responsibility for the explosion, and whether or not prosecution will follow for criminal negligence, remain to be seen. Another investigation, which involves the question of civil damages, is now in progress. The results of these investigations will, no doubt, insure better protection hereafter to life and property.

Serious Damage to Business

New Bedford is greatly disturbed over the failure of several of its mill corporations which have been supposed to be flourishing. The treasurer of three of them, Mr. Frank R. Hadley, it was recently discovered, has made false returns to the State authorities concerning their financial conditions, and on the basis of these statements has borrowed large sums of money. The amount involved is probably not far from $3,000,000. Mr. Hadley was placed under arrest in his own home, from which he could not be removed on account of serious illness. He died last Friday. Three other mills have become seriously involved, and their treasurer, Mr. Howland, has disappeared. Even looking at the most hopeful phases of the situation the business interests of the city must suffer seriously. The perjuries of business men who have been trusted, which have become startlingly common in recent years, have been among the most serious causes of continued business depression, and furnish the gravest hindrances to that return of confidence which is absolutely essential to prosperity. We need no other factor to revive business so much as the maintenance of such standards of integrity that business men will feel that it is safe to trust one another.

Murder in New Hampshire

Mr. Joseph A. Stickney, a bank cashier in Somersworth, N. H., was found dead in the bank on Friday, April 16. It was evident that he had been brutally murdered while defending the property of the bank. Joseph E. Kelley was suspected, traced, and on the following Tuesday was arrested in Montreal disguised in a woman's dress. He has confessed the crime and has been brought to Dover, N. H., where he is imprisoned, awaiting trial. Several newspapers have daily disfigured their pages with pictures of the confessed murderer in various attitudes. They have devoted columns to his biography, to his sayings, to descriptions of his personal appearance, to pictures of his cell, his food, his keepers and relatives. Such so-called journalism spreads an atmosphere of crime, stimulates the lowest passion for notoriety and reflects a public taste which menaces society. Regard for public safety, if nothing more, ought to be sufficient to keep such newspapers out of sight.

A New Police Commissioner for New York

Mayor Strong has succeeded in finding a man for the place made vacant on the Police Board by the withdrawal of Mr. Roosevelt. After several had declined the position it has been accepted by Mr. Frank Moss. It was quite time for the place to be filled, as practically nothing has been done since Mr. Roosevelt left the board except to quarrel over appointments. Mr. Moss was for several years counsel of Dr. Parkhurst's Society for the Prevention of Crime. He thoroughly understands the police force. He is an upright man, and he undoubtedly desires to promote honorable administration of city affairs. But he will meet strong opposition and he cannot expect to accomplish much. The bi-partisan organization of the board is essentially vicious. Commissioners Parker and Grant have shown their incapacity, obstinacy and greed till the better public is disgusted and disheartened. These two men want to use the police force for political purposes, and they have astute politicians to back them. A continuation of wrangles and scandals seems to be inevitable during the remainder of the year, but it is possible that Mr. Moss has a strong enough personality to restrain the board from demoralization.

An Inheritance Tax

The New York legislature has passed a law largely increasing the State tax on successions or inheritances of personal estate. Hereafter personal property amounting to from $500 to $10,000 passing to collateral heirs will pay a tax of five per cent., while the percentage of tax is increased on larger sums, till, on estates amounting to $3,750,000 and over, it is fixed at fifteen per cent. for collateral heirs and ten per cent. to direct heirs. An inheritance tax on personal estate is reasonable, for it is levied on property which to a large extent has escaped taxation in the hands of its owners. The action taken by New York will stimulate legislation of a similar character in other States. But the rate now fixed in that State is excessive, and will tend to defeat its purpose. Personal property is easily transferred, and may be held under various conditions. Ways will be devised by which rich men may keep the use of their money during their lives, and yet not hold it in their possession at death. It will not be surprising to find that many reputed millionaires in New York die poor, their property having already passed into the hands of their chosen heirs.

Blows at Civil Service

It is evident that the enemies of civil service reform have gained new courage of late. The decision of the Court of Appeals in New York last week declared to be noncompetitive certain positions which lower courts had declared competitive. This decision was followed by the passage of Governor Black's Civil Service Bill through the Assembly last Friday by a vote of 110 to twenty nine. The bill places considerably increased responsibility for appointments in the hands of executive officers. Strong remonstrances against it were presented to the Assembly by delegations from Buffalo, Rochester, New York and other cities and by the Civil Service Reform Association, but these had no effect. For this attack on the merit system the Republican party of New York is responsible, and will surely suffer for it. The new mayor of Chicago and the Pension Commissioner at Washington, in their efforts to fill public offices by candidates who have not passed examinations, indicate the ceaseless vigilance which will be constantly necessary to repress the spoils system, which many reformers had begun to hope was near its end.

City versus State

Public interest in Chicago and in other cities of Illinois has been centered in the Humphrey Bill, which proposes to take away from municipalities the right to control their own streets and to turn them over to three commissioners appointed by the governor. As a blow at home rule the bill is justly subject to criticism, nor is there any immediate necessity for passing it. The street car lines for whose benefit it is proposed can continue to run under present charters for several years yet, and it is perfectly easy for them to obtain such privileges as they really need from the city authorities. But there have been too many members in the Common Council requiring money or its equivalent in order to secure these privileges, and it seems to be thought a wiser procedure to limit the number of men who will need to be "fixed." Nevertheless, the citizens of Chicago, corrupt as they have thought their Common Council, prefer to keep the control of their streets in their own hands rather than to turn it over for fifty years to commissioners, however capable they may be. A mass meeting Sunday afternoon in Central Music Hall, in condemnation of the bill, was addressed by leading citizens who spoke in no uncertain tones. Tuesday evening in Battery D at least 5,000 citizens listened to burning words from Governor Altgeld, who is now posing as the champion of all that is just and righteous, and Mr. John Harlan, whose directness of speech is sometimes a relief for pent up passion. The resolutions adopted at this meeting, not only in opposition to the bill but in condemnation of the senators who have voted for it, were the severest which have ever been passed by any gathering of the kind in Chicago. Possibly it would have been wiser had they been more temperate in expression. The press is making a good fight against the bill. Delegations are doing what they can with representatives at the capital, and with some prospect of making the will of the people, which undoubtedly is against the bill, respected. Should it pass, a good many political graves will be dug, and it would not be strange if Mr. Yerkes, who is supposed to be behind the bill, were compelled to leave the city for good.

Ex-President Cleveland at the Reform Club

The first public speech of Mr. Cleveland since his administration closed made the annual meeting of the Reform Club in New York last Saturday evening a significant political event. Prominent men were present from many sections of the country and the occasion was made the inauguration of a movement to rehabilitate the Democratic party. Mr. Cleveland showed that he and his followers have no sympathy with the plans of the Republican party, with its protective tariff bill, and still less with the free silver organization which claims to be the Democratic party. He declared that peril from that party is grave and directly impending over the country through the persistence of the "allied forces of calamity." He affirmed that the cause of sound money Democracy is not hopeless, and urged that thorough organization should be made and earnest efforts to win their former associates "from the way that leads to party defeat and destruction." Three prominent political parties thus appear already in the field looking toward the next presidential campaign, indicating a coming political excitement perhaps more prolonged and intense than that through which we have lately passed.

The Work of the Dawes Commission

The end of the five so-called "nations" in the Indian Territory seems to be not far distant. The efforts of the commission of which ex-Senator Dawes is chairman have proved successful, and last Friday a treaty was signed which provided for the distribution in severalty of the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes. The Choctaw freedmen are each to receive forty acres. The remainder of the land is to be so divided that each member of the two tribes shall receive an equal share. Similar arrangements will be made with the other three tribes. All the lands are to be nontaxable as long as they are held by the allottees, up to twenty-one years. The United States court is to have partial jurisdiction over the Indians, and the present form of government is to continue eight years. The work rendered by the Dawes Commission has been a difficult and delicate one. Its assured success averts grave dangers. The section of country occupied by the five tribes is one of the most attractive in the whole interior of our country, and the bringing of it under order and law by peaceful means is a service of great importance.

Canadian Schools

The government's recent disposition of the public school difficulty in Manitoba was expected to put an end to open strife and in due time to prove reasonably satisfactory. But Monsignor Merry Del Val, the papal delegate to Canada, is said to have decided against it, and more trouble is threatened. A dissolution of Parliament is proposed in the belief that, although the Province of Quebec, which is strongly Roman Catholic, may oppose the government's policy as to schools, the great body of the Canadian people will indorse it, thus reassuring the government and discrediting the opposition as well as inferentially rebuking the papal delegate, and thus rendering such interference less likely for the future. It is high time that the matter were settled and it can be settled only in one way—as public sentiment and the authorities have shaped it.

The Greek-Turkish War

Spirited and almost incessant fighting has been going on during the week, and on the whole in favor of the Turks. Their plan is to break the Greek center and threaten Athens. Having captured the Milouna Pass through the Chassia range of mountains, they have advanced into Thessaly upon the important town of Larissa and finally captured it. The Greeks have retreated to Pharsala and are making a fresh stand there. The valor of the Greeks is fully worthy of their history. They repulsed the Turks seven times at Mati, for example, and have fought gallantly everywhere. This is equally true of the Turks. But thus far they clearly have won only by force of much superior numbers. They have been able to overwhelm the Greeks by more abundant battalions. The Greek policy has been to try to outflank the Turks as well as to resist them at the center of operations, and when the possibility of cutting the Turkish communications thus, and also of enkindling an anti-Turkish revolt in Macedonia in the Turkish rear, is considered, this policy has much in its favor, in spite of its inevitable weakening of Greek resistance at the center. The Greeks have continued to gain the advantage on both the west coast and the east. They have advanced towards Janina in the West, while their navy has destroyed important Turkish settlements and quantities of military supplies along the Gulf of Salonica on the East. Osman Pasha, the hero of Plevna in the Russo-Turkish war, has been put in charge of the Turkish operations, Edhem Pasha not having accomplished what was expected of him.

Probably a great battle will occur immediately at Pharsala, where Cæsar defeated Pompey in 48, B. C. Here the Greeks have a strong position and may make a tremendous struggle. But the probabilities are against them because the Turks can outnumber them as easily as heretofore. Probably, also, after a great battle here or elsewhere, the great Powers will compel a peace. It is much to be doubted if either combatant is permitted to reap any important gain from their strife. Moreover, each will be so exhausted financially as to become more than ever a mere puppet in the hands of the strong Powers. Meanwhile, a single day may put a wholly new face upon the situation. But, even if a Macedonian revolt in aid of Greece were likely at first, it is daily becoming less probable. Bulgaria will remain formally neutral but is using her opportunity. She has refused to expel Greek consuls at Turkey's demand, and has called upon the sultan to concede patents of privilege for five more bishops in Macedonia and for Bulgarian commercial agents at Uskub and Monastir. This is indirect aid to Greece as well as an indication that Bulgaria is alert to grasp her own independence, if possible. But the future interest of the great game is to lie chiefly in the development of the mutual combinations and rivalries of the leading Powers. The latest accounts are that the Turks are marching on Volo, and that an alarming revolutionary feeling is breaking out in Athens.

NOTES

Judge Showalter of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals has decided that the three cent fare law for street railroads recently passed by the Indiana legislature is unconstitutional.

Col. John Hay, United States ambassador to Great Britain, had a cordial reception, both official and popular, at Southampton, on landing there, April 21, and has already paid a visit to the Foreign Office in London. The English press also has received him warmly.

On Thursday, April 22, an insane man at Rome rushed up to the royal carriage, as King Humbert was driving out to the races, and tried to stab the king with a dagger. The king evaded the blow, the man was arrested and the king proceeded, apparently undisturbed.

A squadron of eight British war ships appeared last week in Delagoa Bay in South Africa which England has just bought from Portugal. Its presence caused considerable excitement. The purpose of this purchase, doubtless, is to check anti-British intrigues between the Germans and the Boers.

The New York assembly, by killing the Anti-Cartoon Bill, has done what most astute prophets expected. The assembly has carried through some good and some evil legislation; its closing is not unwelcome to any classes.

The Mississippi floods have abated but little, and along the southern course of the great stream citizens and public officials have worked day and night to avert ruin. The region submerged produced last year crops aggregating a value of $22,000,000. The extent and the duration of the floods have caused them to take on the proportions of a national disaster, and some plan will have to be devised for averting in the future such a calamity.

The effect of recently enacted amendments to the Raines Law in New York State seems likely to be of large importance to the cause of temperance. Hotels cannot now get licenses to sell liquor without having a certain number of rooms under such conditions as make it evident that they are not run merely as saloons. They must pay a tax of $800 a year for license. So also must clubs, and those formed since two years ago must be open to inspection by proper authorities under the same conditions as saloons. No doubt many hundreds of "fake" hotels and clubs will be compelled to close.

Four deaths have already occurred among members of the present House of Representatives, which has been in session less than two months. Mr. Milliken of Maine had long represented his district, and did good service on the committee on public buildings. Mr. Holman of Indiana, who died last week, had had a career covering nearly forty years of Washington political life. Most of this time he was in Congress, where he earned the title of the Great Objector. He believed in spending the people's money cautiously, and in a day when few err on the side of economy his efforts to restrain extravagance were creditable, even though sometimes they approached parsimony.

The latest obstacle thrust in the way of the enforcement of the prohibitory law of New Hampshire is the refusal of the grand jury of Merrimack County to bring in any indictment of liquor cases of the forty brought before it, in the face of the most convincing evidence, some of the cases being notoriously aggravated. This is a blow at the very foundation of law and order, and seems to be a revelation of the program of a liquor league said to have been recently formed in the State for the protection of their traffic. The friends of temperance are justly indignant. They petitioned the judge for a special jury to sit on these cases, but were denied for the reason that the information, as it is, may be filed by the county solicitor for the next regular jury. But this gives an extension of six months in which the guilty parties may continue their vile traffic. The case seems all the worse from the fact that these cases were mostly brought by the regularly constituted officers under the law simply doing their duty, and not by the Law and Order League. That New Hampshire is not yet ready long to allow the continuance of such a trend towards anarchy we confidently believe.

IN BRIEF

Vacation days for many of our readers are drawing near, and those who desire to combine cheapness and pleasure in a foreign trip will find a suggestive article in this week's issue—the first of a series of three on Bypaths of European Travel.

This looks like business. The committee on plans for the new Congregational House, as the result of competition, has unanimously elected those submitted by the well-known firm of Shepley, Rutan & Coolidge, and so reported to the directors at a meeting held last Monday.

Editors are sometimes appreciated, even those who have become veterans in religious journalism. Rev. J. N. Hallock, the accomplished editor of Christian Work, has been called to the presidency of the new Westminster University of Denver, Col., at a salary of $10,000.

The Swedish Government proposes to start a balloon toward the North Pole with three Swedish scientists. It is to depart from Spitzbergen about July 1. Dr. Nansen says nothing is to be gained by further researches in that direction, but it will be a real gain, by finding the pole, to put an end to dangerous efforts to reach after that which is of no value.

Among prominent daily papers which publish weekly articles on the International Sunday School Lessons are the New York Times and the Chicago Record. The exposition for the Record is written by Rev. Dr. J. L. Withrow. These are indications that the use of the International Lessons is as popular as ever, and that the demand for expositions of them is not lessening.

The Church Economist is a new religious newspaper, whose editor was till recently the publisher of the Evangelist. Its aim and theme is the economy of church energy. The first number is a good beginning. The Congregationalist has been working on that line for more than fourscore years, and yet the waste of church energy, in proportion to its production, is immense.

The simple raising of the question by Rev. Dr. F. A. Gunsaulus whether he may not find it wise to resign his pastorate at Plymouth Church seems to have brought forth unanimous protests from all quarters in Chicago. His audiences continue to fill the church and he is in constant demand for addresses and lectures. He preached last Sunday at Broadway Tabernacle, New York, and it was intimated that, if he is ready to consider a call from that church, it is ready to be placed before him.

There still come to hand touching expressions of the love of American children for the orphans of far-away Armenia. Accompanying a small gift from a Sunday school class in Illinois, the other day, was a letter stating that it was the first offering to others that this particular class of little boys had ever made. Several girls in Providence, about twelve years old, held a little fair, recently, and realized $10 for the Orphans' Fund. We are sure that none of the money which goes from America to Turkey carries more of the fragrance of real devotion and sacrifice than the amounts which have been raised by the children in various parts of the country.

The Christian Leader, noting the fact that Dr. Lyman Abbott was not allowed to give his course of lectures on the Bible at the Y. M. C. A. hall in Philadelphia, on the ground that he is not orthodox, recalls another interesting fact concerning the same building. Several years ago the Universalist General Convention was, for the same reason, denied the use of the hall for a public meeting, but it was soon after opened for Sitting Bull and his band to give an exhibition of their war dances. Probably the officers of that Y. M. C. A. believe that an Indian war dance is less dangerous to their building than a theological scrimmage. Notwithstanding, we have yet to hear of a Congregational church which has been closed to Dr. Lyman Abbott.

The talk is now of Prof. George Adam Smith as successor to Dr. Pentecost in the pastorate of the Marylebone Presbyterian Church in London. We doubt if he would care to return to the pastorate even with so attractive an opportunity. The esteem in which a professorship in a divinity college is held on the other side of the water makes it to most ministers the goal of professorial ambition. At the same time it must be confessed that Dr. Smith's extraordinary pulpit ability qualifies him for a metropolitan charge. Those who heard him here last year will recall the effectiveness of all his pulpit and platform work. A New England theological professor pronounced one of his Chicago sermons the best he ever listened to, not excepting those of Phillips Brooks.

Few people appreciate the value of self-respect as a reforming agency. A prodigal who had fallen from his high estate to the depths of social degradation tells how he came to the parting of the ways. An employer, his inferior every way except morally, inquired of him if he knew of some one who would accept menial service in his employ. To the young man's reply that he would take the place himself, the other responded, "I supposed you would think it beneath you." This was the turning point in his life. The consciousness that anybody thought him too good for even the humblest service developed into a purpose to "mount the ladder round by round" until he regained his former social position. He now has attained that and more and is today a Christian gentleman.

You say you liked that last sermon of your pastor's? Why not tell him so then? He doesn't get any too much praise. And there is a wide difference between conventional compliments and fulsome flattery on the one hand and the straightforward expression of gratitude for help received. Apropos of this point there comes to hand as we write a private letter from an Episcopal bishop, widely known and honored in our own communion. He says: "Do you suppose any man with a head on his shoulders is ever really affected in the least as to his judgment of himself by public compliments? Do we not all know that if our wives and children or other housemates were to tell the world what they know about us it would be a very different story—a story of faults, errors, infirmities, ill temper, hasty speech and manifold shortcomings?"

How the New York churches are striding up town! The latest one to follow the procession thither is what is perhaps the most prominent Universalist organization in the city known as the Church of the Divine Paternity. It worshiped for the last time last Sunday in its present structure which, after all, is not so very far down town, being three blocks north of the Grand Central Station. It, however, deems it the part of wisdom to migrate twenty blocks further north to Seventy-sixth Street, where it will build a church costing about $200,000. The problem of church building is measurably solved for those city churches that move up town, since down town property commands so high a price that the proceeds from its sale usually leave something of a surplus after the new structure has been provided for. We trust, however, that this financial consideration is not the main motive that prompts such changes.

Principal H. B. Frissell of Hampton Institute has certainly scored a notable preliminary success in arranging for so extended a New England campaign in behalf of the institution. Beginning last Sunday in Brookline and Boston, the Hampton party of speakers and singers have appointments for nearly every day up to May 23. Their meetings are to be held in the leading churches of the places visited. The itinerary covers eastern Massachusetts quite thoroughly, with detours to the central and western part of the State, while other New England cities, like Manchester, Concord and Nashua, N. H., Providence, R. I., Norwich and Hartford, Ct., are also included. A Negro and an Indian are among the speakers, and thus the audiences will be able to estimate the concrete results of the work done at Hampton in behalf of the races which they represent. We are sure that the success of the meetings will add to the large amount of interest and enthusiasm already existing in New England for General Armstrong's school.

Rev. Dr. James H. Brookes, who died in St. Louis on Easter Sunday at the age of sixty-eight, was a man of striking individuality. A Southerner by birth, he was pastor of a Presbyterian church in St. Louis for thirty-seven years. Here in the East he was known chiefly through publications and his occasional participation, some years ago, in Northfield conferences. He was a stanch premillennarian and no less sure of the entire inerrancy of the Bible. Most of his seventeen books and 200 tracts, as well as the magazine, The Truth, which he edited, are devoted to the championship of one or the other of these two positions. For many years he was a close friend of Mr. Moody's, and at Y. M. C. A. gatherings and evangelistic conferences he was a welcome speaker. If he had been a little less uncompromising in his advocacy of his own theological beliefs, his admitted ability would have made him more widely influential, though he drew to himself many warm admirers.

AT HOME

Agnes Repplier, in the April Atlantic, exhorts aspirants for literary fame as follows: "O writers of dull verse and duller prose, quit the well-worked field of fiction, the arid waste of sonnets and sad poems, and chronicle in little leather-covered books the incidents which tell their wondrous tales of resistless and inevitable change. Write of electric motors, of bicycles, of peace societies, of hospitals for pussy cats, of women's clubs and colleges, of the price of food and house rent, of hotel bills, of new fashions in dress and furniture, of gay dinners, of extension lectures, of municipal corruption and reform, of robberies unpunished, of murders unavenged. These things do not interest us profoundly now, being part of our daily surroundings, but the generations that are to come will read of them with mingled envy and derision—envy because we have done so little, derision because we think that we have done so much."

The Interior is able to look back on temperance battles fought before most of us had become interested in warfare on moral issues, and it sighs for the good old times, from 1840 to 1854, when saloons were nearly banished from the country. It believes that if the elements of discord forced into temperance ranks by the prohibition party were taken out of the way, the victories of the last generation could be repeated and made greater: "We can agree on legislative repression, if that is put pure and simple, but force along with it woman's rights, partisan, socialistic and economical questions, and whatever of political issues a convention may take a notion for, and then abuse men because they will not vote for what they oppose, in order that they may vote for what they want, and the repressive principle of temperance will remain, as it is now, represented politically by a small minority. What we need to do is to reform our phalanxes on the original victorious lines. We here express no opinion about any of the issues associated with prohibition. Our word is to those who advocate them all—broaden. Put up no obstructions against any temperance man or prohibitionist. Give everybody who hates the liquor traffic a chance at it. Give each man an opportunity to vote for what he prays for without voting for what he prays against. And it will come to that. It will be seen that there can be no success with divided counsels and purposes—and we prophesy that this reunion of temperance forces will come. It must come, and is bound to come, and with it victory."

ABROAD

They have in England a Peace Society so largely controlled by the Tories that the April issue of its organ defends the concert of the Powers as necessary to preserve peace. With this contention both the British Weekly and the Christian World take sharp issue. The latter journal says: "We wonder what John Bright would have said to such an indorsement of the concert that shells Cretans rightly struggling to be free, that sinks ships bringing provisions to the Greek liberators, that girdles the island with ironclads and gunboats, and threatens in like manner to girdle Greece, while it calmly looks on at the sultan's massacre of 100,000 Armenians, at the worse than massacre of scores of thousands of Armenian girls and women, at the firing of villages and the deflement and burning of churches. The concert could, if it would, put an end at once to the hell on earth called the 'Ottoman empire,' but, from selfish, dog-in-the-manger motives, it inscribes on its banner 'the integrity of the Ottoman empire.' This is not preserving peace, but maintaining a constant menace to the peace of Europe, and perpetuating the daily war between the ravening Turk and the helpless Christians under his cruel claws. And to such a concert The Herald of Peace gives its benediction! No wonder that many Friends and lovers of peace are disgusted at such an application of peace principles."

The Christian is disposed to look hopefully on the religious situation. It says: "One of our popular journalists thinks that if we take the current literatures of France, Germany, Italy and Scandinavia, as indicating the opinion of the most educated classes on the subject of religion, 'one would say that religion, in the old sense, had almost died out of Europe.' However, he is firmly convinced that 'religion is not dead, but hibernating as preparatory to a new metamorphosis.' The yearnings of the soul, at present so feebly supported by reason, are to find a 'clear, scientific sanction.' We fancy that in every age the educated classes have been a poor guide to the state of true religion, and that, if their attitude be the gauge of religious faith and feeling, religion has always been hibernating. Yet, notwithstanding that, it has a remarkable way of getting about the world, and of making itself felt by almost every nation under heaven. It gets along without a scientific sanction, as in Paul's time it dispensed with a philosophic sanction. It appeals to heart and conscience, and reason justifies their decision."

FROM INDIA

The Twin Scourges

This land still remains under the dreadful curse of plague and famine. The one slays its thousands, and the other its tens of thousands, monthly. With all the horrors of the plague we are yet thankful that it has not spread much beyond Bombay and vicinity. One shudders to think of its possibilities of devastation were its working area as extensive as that of the famine. It would be more comforting to the public if the doctors and bacteriologists exhibited less ignorance and incompetence in face of this fell disease. And yet, with many scientists of world-wide fame prying into its secrets, determined to overcome and eradicate it, and with this practical government of Englishmen devoting its many resources to stamp it out, we can wait, confident of the ultimate, if tardy, result. As for the famine, no one can tell the extent or intensity of its work. In its train always follow poverty, want, loss of all property, hunger, emaciation, disease and death. And all famine deaths by no means occur during the famine season. As a direct result of the famine of twenty years ago in South India, tens of thousands succumbed to death within the decade following, and the indelible stamp of those three terrible years of suffering is found upon many thousands of the survivors today. The present famine is very extensive, beginning in the northwestern provinces, where it is most acute, and extending to the northern portion of the Madras Presidency, where it is least distressing. There are more than three million people in the government relief camps and engaged in relief works, conducted by government for their special benefit. In England and India about two and a half million dollars have been contributed for famine relief. It seems as if the whole world—including Russia—is extending a hand of loving sympathy to the suffering millions of India. And yet some insist that this world is growing worse!

Dr. Clark's Visit

Our dear brother, "Father Endeavor Clark," has paid us another visit, and we feel more hopeful in our work for young India. The grand movement of Christian Endeavor which he so eloquently represents has already struck deeply its roots into the Christian soil of India, and is rapidly spreading. National and provincial organizations have been already perfected, and these represent a large number of vigorous, even if small, societies for the young. What India needs today is a marshaling of all its Christian youth with enthusiasm for the redemption of the people.

A well-known English missionary the other day pronounced his anathema upon all such organizations, and bluntly remarked that we Americans were intoxicated with a craze for organization. Well, we plead guilty. It certainly seems that the genius of the Americans for organization has followed them to this land. Whenever any new movement, or newly organized endeavor, for the furtherance of the cause of Christ has appeared during the last few years, it has come with its American stamp upon it. One will be surprised to find, in this land where English effort and influence are supposed to be paramount, how many of the most hopeful Christian movements, especially those for the young, are distinctively American in source and spirit. We say this not boastfully, but with joy in the grand opportunities which this great land furnishes to our American form of Christianity.

Dr. Barrows Too

Dr. Barrows's visit and course of lectures were looked forward to with varied sentiments by the many interested in India's religious welfare. The many Christian workers who do not believe in the Parliament of Religions, and who identified him with it, were trembling lest he should utter an uncertain sound concerning the faith which they have devoted their lives to promulgate. This class now heartily acknowledge that their fears were unfounded, and are among his most enthusiastic admirers today. Few of his best friends expected so stalwart and uncompromising a defense of our faith as was given by him in this admirable and eloquent course of seven lectures. They have certainly gained for the Barrows lectureship the warm appreciation of all Protestant missionaries throughout the land. As was to be expected, the Roman Catholics kept aloof from him and his work. The Church of England clergy, also, did not show that liberal spirit which might have been expected of them under such circumstances.

Only the Hindus Disappointed

But what shall be said of the Hindus? They gave him, on the whole, a cordial reception, regarding him as the Western Mæcenas of Hinduism. But they were sadly disappointed in him. They expected of him a stone, and he gave them bread. What could be more unpardonable? The most sorely disappointed among them were impolite enough to say that he spoke like a missionary. How could such indiscretion and bigotry be forgiven in a man so cultured as he? The Hindu papers, notably The Hindu of Madras, wrote elaborate editorials in refutation of the teaching of the lectures and in praise of their own ancestral faith. In this they were doubtless assisted by some of the English rationalists who abound in India, and are only too glad of an opportunity to attack the faith of their fathers. Notwithstanding all this, he received a cordial welcome from many of the best men of the land, and his lectures were well attended and patiently listened to. They have doubtless set many to thinking of these things, and will, at least, make their minds more favorably disposed towards the claims of Christianity as the universal religion. Dr. Barrows gave his full course of lectures in four of the principal cities in India, and a part of the course in several other towns. He was also often invited to preach, which he did with large acceptance everywhere. His addresses and converzationes were numerous, so that he spoke 105 times during his three months' stay in the land—a large work when it is remembered that his lectures consumed, each, more than an hour in the delivery. Add to this the more than 5,000 miles which he traveled in the country, and the constant rounds of social festivities to which he was subjected, and it is a marvel that he was able to say at the close of the journey, as he did, that he had enjoyed good health from first to last. To many a missionary home his presence, and that of his worthy helpmeet, Mrs. Barrows, brought cheer and encouragement. They left our shores with the prayers and best wishes of thousands of warm friends made here for the first time.

An Opportune Counterirritant

At the hands of one man the doctor had expected consideration, if not kindness. That man was the now famous monk, Vivêkânanda, who owed more to Dr. Barrows for his popularity and kind treatment in America than to any one else. But here Dr. Barrows was dismally disappointed. Both happened to meet at Madras, the doctor arriving there a week later than the monk. But the latter abruptly shortened his visit and suddenly left the city for Calcutta without paying his respects in any form to his benefactor and friend. Moreover, he did all in his power to injure Dr. Barrows's influence in the place before he left it. We were not sorry that the founder of the Parliament of Religions happened to be in these regions just as the monk had arrived from his prolonged visit to America. Dr. Barrows was just in time to give the flat denial to the false statements abundantly made by the monk to the effect that Christianity was moribund in the West, and that the teachings of the Vedânta were making such headway that in a decade or so they would become the prevailing doctrines of the Occident. The way that the prolific lies of this man about our faith and his own have already spread, even among the common people, is phenomenal. This is his day of power and popularity. But if he be a fraud, as many besides Dr. Barrows firmly believe, he cannot long abide, though we must confess that India is a land where the greatest impostures have had long lives. In any case I am strongly convinced that this new and strange fanaticism—this reactionary movement towards re enthroning the past and crying down everything that is modern or that savors of the religion of Jesus—will have but a brief day of prosperity. It is but a countercurrent in the large and permanent progress of India religiously. As between the fine-spun phrases and honeyed platitudes of the monk, on the one hand, and the sturdy teaching of Dr. Barrows and a thousand others, on the other, there can be no doubt which will ultimately prevail among this advancing people. The Companions of the Sorrowful Way*

Concerning the Way Itself

By Ian Maclaren

No one can have any doubt where the way ended, but he may have two minds where the way began. If life is to be judged rather by its general trend than by the special experience of a few hours, then it should never be forgotten that all his days the Man of Sorrows was carrying his burden. If life be estimated not by the running of a sand glass, but by the beating of the heart, then surely our Lord endured more cruel agony on his last day than in all his years. There was the unseen cross of divers afflictions, which rested on his life and weighed down his soul from the cradle to the grave, and this was a sore discipline; and there was the visible cross of two rough beams, which was laid upon his bleeding shoulders and weighed his body to the ground; and this was the symbol of an unspeakable tribulation. There were the clouds, which from early morning flecked the sky of our Master's life, and there was the black, massy storm which at the last burst on his head. As the devout Christian chooses, he may join himself to the Lord in the sorrowful way at Gethsemane, or three and thirty years earlier at the manger of Bethlehem. And it may not be unprofitable for the disciple to remind himself that the Lord was walking in the sorrowful way before the incarnation, as he suffered and sorrowed over backsliding Israel unto bitter crying and lamentations, and that he is still to be found therein, as he shares from day to day the temptations and griefs of his church.

Many happy days of childhood he must have lived at home with his holy mother in the mountain village of Nazareth, amid the woods and flowers and fields and animals which he loved. Yet the pain of self-repression is already his, and the moan of the offended little ones is heard in his after speech. Some quiet years of manhood he also spent at the carpenter's bench, where he was baptized into the toil of the world before he was baptized into its sin, and in the peasant life, whose ways were to run forever through his parables. Yet it is evident from his discourses that he had tasted the weariness of labor and had been partaker of the unjust lot of the poor. Outside Nazareth his path, after a brief sunshine, lay in ever deepening shadows. People followed him in crowds, only to leave him in displeasure. He called twelve disciples, who pained him daily by their slowness of understanding. In one village he was able to heal a few sick; in the next he could do nothing because of the people's unbelief. When he made his appeal to the good folk they suspected and misunderstood him. When the publicans and evil-livers came to him it was a cause of offense. One of his chosen band was a traitor, and there was not one on whom he could rely. No servant of his has ever fulfilled a harder ministry than the Master; from Capernaum to Jerusalem—lonely, rejected, disappointed, grieved—he walked in the sorrowful way.

The devout soul will not fail to see the print of the nails on Jesus' feet on the paths of Galilee, or to hear the sighing of Jesus' heart as he spake in the synagogues; but the church will ever count the last day of his life the sum of sorrow, and although she may not always have the pictures before her eyes she has ever the stations of the cross in her heart. As a vine through the long summer time drains its sap into the grapes, and in autumn the purple clusters are trodden in the wine press, so was Jesus' life pressed in the cup of salvation, and the world has drunk of its sweetness. Sorrow, having followed this man all his days, now prepared her crown and set it on his head, and of all the ruby gems not one was wanting. He was betrayed by one disciple, denied by another and forsaken by all. He was despised by his nation, cast out by his church, condemned by his rulers, refused justice by the Romans; he was counted a deceiver of the people, a rebel against law, a blasphemer against God. He was arrested, bound, scourged; he was spat upon, mocked, crucified. Having endured huge pains of soul and body, it seemed as if God himself had forsaken him, and after this fashion he traveled the sorrowful way.

As the very essence of human sorrow was distilled into the last day, it was fitting that like human life the way should begin and end in a garden. First there is the garden of Gethsemane, where Jesus had his oratory and met with God and the angels of God ministered to him; and there is the garden of Joseph, where those whom he had saved laid him to rest, and he slept in peace after his sore travail. Between the gardens the way compassed all the varieties of life—in the valley of Kedron and on the hill of Calvary, in the country with its vines and olives, in the city with its streets and crowds. Jesus, before he left the city, was in a king's palace and an ecclesiastical court and a judgment hall and a barracks. He was with kings, priests, governors, soldiers; he was with women, country folk, working people, malefactors. For the way of sorrow passes through all classes, all houses, all places, and therein Jesus walked from end to end, so that at any point one may find himself with Jesus.

Between the way of this last day and the way in which Jesus had walked all the days there was this difference, that while before Jesus was chiefly active, now he was nearly passive. For three years he preached the evangel in the synagogues, by the well-side, in boats, moving gently on the waters of the lake, on the grassy slope of hills. Now he held his peace and would answer nothing. Day and night had he labored, journeying from city to city, untiring, self-forgetful, eager. Now he is led backwards and forwards at the pleasure of his guards. His joy was to heal the sick, to raise the dead, to comfort those who mourned. Now his great power is hindered and sleeps as he himself is smitten and wounded. Once his work was to gather disciples to his side and instruct them in the mysteries of God's kingdom. Now his desire is to secure their safety and to see them depart in peace. For a lifetime he had set himself to do the will of his Father; for the last day he resigned himself to bear the same will, which was ever blessed and ever good.

If it were given unto us to choose the way wherein we should walk, is there one of us would not prefer the way of doing to the way of suffering? What soldier would not rather charge on the most forlorn hope, with an almost certainty of dying in the breach, than to stand on the deck of a sinking vessel till she made the last plunge and the cold waters closed over his head? For he who charged had done something, putting heart into an army, showing the road to victory, giving his body for a bridge; but he who stood did nothing, striking no blow, advancing no cause, leaving no memorial. What mother is there whose heart is not light as she watches over her children and toils for their welfare unto the hours of the night, but who would fret and worry were she laid aside and commanded to rest? Any servant of Christ would ten times rather face a hostile world even unto death in the declaration and defense of the evangel, than to be silenced and to hear from afar the sound of the battle. Ah! the multitude of the victims who have ceased to labor or resist, who carry the cross in silence along the sorrowful way with the Lord.

It seems to sight an immense tragedy, but is it certain that the victims are wasted lives, which render no service to God's good cause, which have no share in the victory of the ages? It is not given unto us to know who has done most for a household—the strong man who won for them the meat which perisheth by the sweat of his brow, or the patient sufferer who has made gentle their souls. We value highly the patriot whose brave words and stalwart heart establish righteousness in the market place, but may assign too little effect to his fellow held in prison and bonds. When some ancient tyranny comes crashing to the ground, the reward will be divided between the soldiers and the martyrs. When for a lifetime Jesus did the will of God most diligently, the world saw an example of perfect law-keeping, and now the child and the man, the friend and the evangelist, all men and women together, stand before God complete in his final obedience. So much he did for us and the eternal law in his years. When for a day Jesus meekly drank the cup his Father placed in his hands, he broke the dread power of sin and vindicated the majesty of law, so that in him we all might stand victorious. So much he did for us and the eternal law in his passion. The sorrowful way became the triumphal way wherein he walked in white, and the cross to which he was nailed has changed into his throne.

One of the most lamentable results of the hard times is that it obliges not a few men who have hitherto held important and lucrative positions in the business world to take up with any experiment whatever which may promise them a living. We know of men, some of whom six years ago were on the top wave of prosperity, who now are holding inferior clerkships, or even going from door to door selling articles or ingenious devices whereby their own purses are replenished, while their customers receive what they may perhaps charitably consider an equivalent for their modest outlay. We confess to a great respect for such men, who at the cost of not a little personal humiliation are trying to support themselves and their families. Far nobler is their course than one of dependence upon their friends, or of useless rebellion against their hard fortune. We had a call the other day from a man selling a self winding clock. He presented his case in the briefest, cheeriest fashion, winding up with this phrase: "This is my story. It's a short one, but may be yours will be shorter." There was something so modest and withal so gentlemanly in his bearing that an instinctive admiration for him sprung up in our heart. He seemed to have cheerfully accepted his rather disagreeable task of going from office to office with his wares. If fate had been adverse, he was evidently putting his confidence in the future. All honor to such men. May their courage not flag through these long continued months of business depression. May they find those who, recognizing in them sturdy and praiseworthy traits, shall help them to regain their footing.

BYPATHS OF EUROPEAN TRAVEL

I. THE STEAMBOAT

BY H. W. DUNNING, YALE UNIVERSITY

A vacation trip to Europe has now become such an everyday matter that it has taken a certain stereotyped form. It is customary to cross in an express steamer, spend a week or so in the larger English cities, then to London and Paris, possibly finishing with a short trip to Switzerland. In fact, a recent writer affirms that the number of American visitors to Paris is a fair estimate of the total number of American travelers in Europe. To accommodate this host of tourists a special class of hotels has sprung up. These have a peculiar character of their own. In many other ways the observant visitor notices that in these places he is not seeing the real Europe, but an artificial world, largely created by and for him and his comrades. It quite changes the character of a Swiss holiday or wrestling tournament to know that it is gotten up with especial reference to attracting and preying upon visitors. But there are yet routes of travel where one can have every comfort and still be free from the annoyances incident to the tourist route. I shall mention some of these. Railway routes are omitted because they are usually treated in the ordinary guide-books, and we turn first to the steamer.

Every one knows of the larger ocean lines. The patriotic American travels by the express steamers of the American Line to Southampton, or on the slower vessels to Antwerp. The Cunard and White Star run fast steamers to Queenstown and Liverpool, while the North German Lloyd and Hamburg-American Line go to Plymouth, Cherbourg and the German ports. On all these lines the minimum price in the summer season for a first-cabin passage is now $75. There are also lines of slower steamers to Glasgow, Liverpool and Dutch and Scandinavian ports with slightly lower prices.

But unless speed is important it is cheaper and pleasanter to go in another way. The large twin-screw freighters, with accommodations for from twenty to two hundred passengers, at a rate of about $50, are now popular. These vessels are large, usually 8,000 tons or more. They make the passage in from seven to fifteen days. Many of them carry only first cabin passengers, and so a large deck area is open to them. Most of them carry cattle on the eastward passage, but this causes little annoyance. The Leyland Line from Boston to Liverpool, the Hamburg-American regular service to Hamburg and the Atlantic Transport Line to London belong to this class. The Wilson Line is having five such vessels built to run between New York and London. Some of them will be ready for service this fall. If they maintain the reputation of the Buffalo and Colorado, they will speedily become favorites. The traveler to Switzerland and Italy will find it more convenient to go direct to Genoa. He can choose between the elegant, fast and high-priced steamers of the North German Lloyd and the recently established Atlantic Line, which is slow and cheap.

Upon arrival in Europe get a good guide and learn to use it. Bradshaw's Continental Railway Guide is most used by English-speaking travelers. Hendschel's Telegraph in German is more useful, but requires some study. The large edition has the time-tables and fares of every railroad in Germany and Austria-Hungary, the main lines of the rest of Europe, the principal river, lake and ocean steamers, stagecoaches, and much miscellaneous information. For Austria-Hungary the Konducteur is a model. In Holland Van Santen's Officielle Reisgids is indispensable. Norges Kommunicationer and Sveriges Communicationer are valuable in their respective countries. These publications are very useful in planning a tour, supplementing the necessarily meager and changeable information in Baedeker. They are issued frequently at trifling cost.

Travel by water is pleasanter and less fatiguing than by rail. With some study a comprehensive tour can be planned with but little rail travel. There are usually but two classes, of which only the first is recommended except for short day trips. England and Scotland have a good system of coastal steamers. London has regular, direct communication with almost every port in Europe. The vessels, however, are usually small and should be avoided by people liable to seasickness.

In Norway the traveler is often entirely dependent upon the steamer. North of Trondhjem it affords the only means of communication. Last summer regular steamers were run from Hammerfest to Spitzbergen and a hotel has been erected there. It is about 400 miles northwest of the North Cape and is the most northerly summer resort in the world. The sun is above the horizon for more than four months. Two centuries ago Dutch fishermen came here in large numbers and their town, Smeerenberg, boasted a summer population of 20,000. In southern Norway numerous small steamers ply upon the fiords and lakes. It is sometimes necessary, and almost always advisable, to patronize them. In Sweden the Göta Canal is especially interesting. This was built in the early part of this century and furnishes an inland water route across the country from Stockholm to Gothenburg. This trip was described in The Congregationalist last fall. The long days give an especial charm to travel in Scandinavia in summer. The people seem to enjoy them, too, and spend much of their leisure in the open air.

The large rivers of central Europe are well supplied with steamers during the season. One can travel the entire navigable length of the Rhine from Rotterdam to Mannheim, about 400 miles, for three dollars in the first class. And yet there are people who are content to pass some of the finest river scenery in the world shut up in a railway train, fortunate if they are able to control half of the window on the river side. Then they come home and say that they have seen the Rhine! The Moselle is its only large tributary and offers an interesting side trip. The descent from Trier to Coblenz requires but one day. Central Germany offers some fine scenery in the Elbe, in its passage through the Saxon Switzerland. This is the direct route from Berlin and Dresden to Prague and Vienna. It is appreciated by the Germans, but escapes the notice of most American travelers.

For many years the Danube and its tributaries have had excellent service. Steamers run up as far as Passau on the Bavarian boundary. They furnish a pleasant and direct route to Vienna, Buda-Pesth, Belgrade and the Russian and Turkish ports of the Black Sea. The Iron Gates near Orsova rank among the finest river scenery of Europe.

The Mediterranean has regular steamers to all its ports. They furnish delightful trips, especially in spring and summer. One which has no equal and is but little known is along the Dalmatian coast of the Adriatic. From Trieste to Cattaro frequent steamers run among the islands, making a trip similar to that along the shores of Scandinavia. In summer it is not oppressively hot and seldom rains. The later Roman empire can best be studied here. Dalmatia fell with her mistress, Rome, but on account of her position escaped ruin. Pola possesses the only amphitheater with its outer walls still standing. Spalato is almost inclosed by the old walls of the palace of Diocletian. Near by are the ruins of Valona, a Dalmatian Pompeii. Near Sebenico are the celebrated falls of the Kerka. The scenery along the whole coast is fine, terminating in the magnificent bay of Cattaro. The return trip can be made to Metkovic and thence by the recently opened Bosnian railway via the capital, Serajevo, and Illidze, the Bosnian Baden-Baden.

Last, but first in general interest and accessibility, we come to the Netherlands and its splendid system of rivers and canals. They intersect the whole country and are traversed by a large fleet of steam and sailing vessels. The first class is usually handsomely fitted up and is well worth the trifling additional expense, especially if a shower should come up. It is possible to travel all over Holland by steamer and tramway. Belgium has some fine river scenery on the Meuse. Steamers run from Namur to Dinant, and thence smaller vessels go as far as Hastière. There is also a pleasant trip by canal from Liège to Maestricht on the Dutch frontier.

The Baptists lost a stanch friend last week in the death of Samuel Colgate at Orange, N. J. He acquired a large fortune through his soap and perfumery business, and spent it liberally upon benevolent enterprises. The academy building at Hamilton, N. Y., which bears his name, cost $60,000, and the benevolent societies of the Baptist denomination received large and frequent gifts from him. He was a collector of pamphlets bearing on the history of the Baptist denomination, and gathered some 40,000, which he ultimately made over to Colgate University, the institution his brother James so generously endowed.

In and Around Chicago

The Club

It was ladies' night, and the attendance was good. The meeting Monday evening was at the Palmer House, and the subject was Our Denominational Birthright, with special reference to the Pilgrims at Plymouth, the Pilgrims in Chicago and the Pilgrims of the future. The future of these wanderers was unrolled for us by Dr. J W. Fifield, their history in Chicago, chiefly as represented by the late Deacon Philo Carpenter, to whom Congregationalism and the seminary owe so much, by Prof. H. M. Scott, and in their early history by Dr. Dunning. The latter was aided in his presentation of the stages in the history of the Pilgrims by stereopticon views of great clearness. The defect in his address was its brevity. Regret was almost universally expressed that he could not have had the whole evening, and thus have traced the history of the pioneers of Christian and political liberty in the settlements at Plymouth and Boston. But he managed to tell us a great deal in twenty minutes and to whet our appetite for more.

The Seminary

The closing exercises of this school of the prophets were held in the Union Park Church Wednesday evening, President Fisk in the chair. Classes are now so large that it has been found impracticable to permit every graduate to speak. This year an innovation in the public exercises was introduced, very much to the satisfaction of all concerned. The music, led by Professor Chamberlain, was impressive as well as attractive. One of its special features was the singing by the graduating class of Dr. Gladden's hymn on the mind of Christ, set to music by the professor.

The annual statement of the work of the year was made by the dean of the faculty, Professor Scott. No fellowships have been assigned, inasmuch as the conditions for receiving them do not appear to exist. A suggestive exercise was the reading of the Scripture lesson by Professor Gilbert. Each member of the class had been asked to select a verse expressing his ideals of the ministry and fullest of comfort to himself. These verses were arranged by Professor Gilbert in such a way as to present the ideals of the ministry as found in the Scriptures, and in a certain sense so as to form a kind of spiritual biography of the class. The class was introduced by Professor Gilbert, after which Rev. Fred. Staff gave an address entitled From the Seminary to the Field. He has had charge of the Forrestville church for two years and yet has managed to maintain very high rank in his studies. A welcome to the ministry was then extended to the graduates by Dr. Leavitt of Beloit. This was followed by a welcome to the ministry at large by Rev. Dr. W. M. Lawrence of the Second Baptist Church. The farewell to the class and the conferring of the degrees by President Fisk prepared for the service of consecration which then followed, and which was closed with a prayer by the venerable Rev. Mr. Kedzie of Michigan. Twelve students were given the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, eight received a diploma simply, three graduated from the Danish-Norwegian department and ten from the Swedish department of the seminary—thirty-three in all. Of the 167 in the seminary, it may be interesting to know that 112 received aid from the Education Society or through scholarship funds. It should be added that this aid, increased somewhat by gifts of the Chicago churches, was granted the young men for pastoral service performed in the city.

The New Professor

As was anticipated, Rev. W. D. Mackenzie, who has been acting for two years, was elected to the chair of systematic theology. He has been very popular with the students and his associates in the faculty, and through his charming manners has won for himself a wide circle of friends outside the seminary. As a preacher and for popular addresses he has been in great demand. In addition to his duties as professor he is to be pastor of the Washington Park Church, whose successful future seems now to be assured.

The Alumni Institute

This was held Tuesday. Its president, Rev. W. A. Waterman, D. D., though still suffering from the severe injuries received in the early autumn, was able to be present and to discharge the duties of his office. The time of the two sessions, morning and afternoon, was occupied with devotional services, papers on special topics and discussion. Owing to the crowded nature of the program, there was little opportunity for discussion. In the morning Rev. Willard Scott, D. D., read a paper on Theology and Preaching, in which, while affirming the need of a theology and a systematic theology, too, he insisted that the theology should be up to date, should take account of present phases of thought, and that the preacher should recognize the fact that great changes have taken place in religious thinking, and that unless he does this, and adapts his sermons to the needs of the people, he will not be likely to find hearers. The audience manifested much interest in the paper. Dr. Gunsaulus followed with a paper on The Future Life in Literature. This paper, which in its style, its peculiar literary flavor, its eloquence and in the breadth of its vision was characteristic of its gifted author, confined itself for illustrations chiefly to Emerson, Wordsworth, Tennyson and Browning.

One of the most valuable exercises of the day was a series of five-minute addresses on outpost experiences, given by graduates from the seminary who had been in the field long enough to know something of its trials and its joys. Those who spoke represented the broad Western field and the foreign field as well. There was not a word of complaint or discouragement uttered. Men who came from the hardest fields were full of Christian optimism and referred to their hardships as privileges rather than burdens. Three brief papers, each of them well studied, were presented on preaching, one on the Man and Preaching, by Rev. W. H. Day of Aurora, Ill., one on the Bible and Preaching by Dr. A. R. Thain of The Advance, and another on the Holy Spirit and Preaching by Dr. J. W. Fifield of the Warren Avenue Church. This meeting of the institute was one of the best the graduates of the seminary have held. While making it very clear that there is no danger that these men will fail to take account of present phases of thought, it was equally clear that few of them, if indeed any of them, are likely to be caught in a drift which will bear them away from the old moorings, or render their preaching uncertain and ineffective.

The President's Reception

The size of the classes has now rendered it impossible to have these receptions, which have always been one of the attractive features of the closing exercises of the seminary year, in a private house. Very wisely, therefore, President and Mrs. Fisk decided to receive their friends this year in the seminary parlors. Even these large rooms were crowded with students and the friends of the seminary. The seminary supper was at the First Church, and the numbers served attested the popularity which the ladies of this church have justly acquired for skill in all culinary matters. The after-dinner addresses were of good quality. Dr. Kedzie of Michigan spoke of the beginnings of the seminary more than forty years since; Mr. Blatchford of his trip to Amherst College to secure the services of the late Joseph Haven for the chair of systematic theology, and of a later trip East to secure Prof. S. C. Bartlett as pastor of the New England Church. Dr. Savage read an extract from a letter written by Mrs. Flavel Bascom, whose husband was so devoted to the seminary and to all the interests of our churches. Graduates spoke of the benefits which their years of study had brought to them, and one of the young men just about to enter upon the work referred in manly terms to the training he and his associates have received, and gave expression to the hopefulness with which they are looking to the future. Dr. J. H. George of St. Louis, although not a graduate of the seminary, and in no way indebted to it, while recognizing the work it has done, uttered some truths which cannot fail to be of service to those who care for the spread of our Christian influence in the Southwest.

The Triennial Convention

This gathering, which is a representative one, made up of delegates chosen by the associations or conferences of the States which form the constituency of the seminary, was held Wednesday in the lecture-room of the Union Park Church. The number present was encouragingly large. Rev. J. H. George was moderator and Rev. Q. L. Dowd scribe. The body controls the seminary and therefore listens to reports from it. This year the report of the directors was made by Dr. G. S. F. Savage, who has served as the secretary of this board for thirty-five years, and the report of the faculty by President Fisk. Both reports were eminently satisfactory. Directors were chosen to serve for six years, and one was chosen to fill the vacancy caused by the death of G. N. Camp. There was but one address in the afternoon session. This was made by Dr. Michael Burnham of St. Louis on the preaching needed for the times. It was strong and impressive. Dr. Burnham said that the preacher should first of all, and continually, feel that it is his business to preach the gospel of the Lord Jesus, that he should preach it out of his own experience of its power, and as revealed to us in a book worthy of absolute confidence, as a book from God. He insisted also on the necessity of the most thorough training possible and on the fact that no fads or other methods than those of the gospel can meet the demand of the times or satisfy the needs of the human heart.

Brief addresses by Drs. Noble, Beach, Silcox, Goodwin, Leavitt and Professor Mackenzie, while indicating independence of thought and diversity of standpoint, showed a gratifying unanimity as to the position taken by Dr. Burnham and the aim apparent in what he had said. Had Dr. Behrends been present at these seminary exercises, it may be doubted if he would feel it necessary to write as he has done in The Congregationalist. While the eyes of Western men are open to any new truth which may come to them from the East, or any other quarter, they are not turning their backs on the old truths or ceasing to accept the Scriptures as authoritative. The majority certainly are preaching the evangelical doctrines with the earnestness of a conviction which grows out of personal experience of their power and of a conviction of their truthfulness which no speculations in theological learning or Biblical criticism are likely to weaken. They will accept everything proved, but they will not reject Christ as the only Saviour of men.

It is not enough that man have God in his intellectual creed; he must have him in every fiber of his personality, in every thought and action of his life, otherwise his defeat and his ruin are sure.—J. M. Tyler.

THE ROAD I WOULD FOLLOW

BY THEODORE ROBERTS

The road that my feet are aching to take,
  Now that the days are gold and green,
Is not the road that leads to fame,
  And praise from the lips of a queen.

The road that my feet are longing to go,
  Now that the skies are hollow and blue,
Is not the road that the toilers know,
  Or the one that is set for you.

The road that goes where I would go—
  The path that my eyes are gazing along,
Leads over the hills where the willows glow;
  And I would carol a song,

Footing the road that I long to follow—
  The dear, green road that my feet would explore,
Over the hills, through woodland and hollow,
  And into my father's door.

Unbolted the door—and the shadowed hall
  Would welcome me in to its rest, as of old.
This is the way that I dream of, now
  That the mornings are green and gold.

PARABLES IN PICTURES

V. PHARISEE AND PUBLICAN

BY ESTELLE M. HURLL

In the quaint old church of St. Apollinaris Nuovo at Ravenna, ornamented with mosaics dating back to the sixth century, is one whose subject travelers may have some difficulty in understanding. Two figures stand in front of a row of pillars, between which a curtain is draped. One looks straight out of the picture, raising both arms in what was the ancient attitude of prayer. The other has the head inclined in a deprecating, humble attitude and lays his right hand on his breast. They are the Pharisee and Publican—one boldly offering his prayer, the other too humble to raise his arms in supplication. Leap over some fourteen centuries and we find the same scene in the pages of Tissot's Illustrated Life of Christ.

What the old mosaic only rudely suggests the modern aquarelle very fully explains, giving all the details of the setting and dress with strict historical accuracy. Our illustration lies midway between the two pictures and belongs to the set of miniatures painted by Liberale da Verona in the fifteenth century. Here the temple is a mediæval Italian church, with windows looking out on a fair Italian landscape. The Pharisee stands directly in front of the altar in the most sacred spot of the sanctuary. Raising his right hand in a conversational gesture, he makes his self-laudatory remarks, while his left points backward to the Publican, kneeling behind him on the floor. The contrast between the two is capital. The Pharisee is the express image of Pharisaism; the Publican is the picture of humility. Turning from one to the other, one can almost fancy that it tickled the painter's sense of humor to set forth this pseudo sanctimoniousness in contrast to true penitence. Liberale was plainly a shrewd observer of human nature, and in his delineation of the two types of prayer he shows a clear understanding of the difference between the true and the false.

In God's sight nothing that tends to help others is secular. Everyday duties are divine, like larger obligations. To do well our work we must "be endued with power from on high." What is this but inspiration? We need the discipline of the schools. We imperatively require the divine help. We gain larger abilities by the severest discipline. We are inspired by suffering to make life easier for others.—D. O. Mears.

THE INDWELLING CHRIST

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Wonderful and precious beyond words is the thought of the indwelling Christ, the Christ living in our souls and expressing himself through us, his light in our faces, his power in our endeavors, his grace in our smallest actions. Not coming to us now and then, as comes the wayfarer who knocks at the door and is admitted for a transient stay; not even visiting us as does the dear and friendly guest, whose occasional tarrying under the roof is a benediction while it remains and a pleasant memory when it is over; not thus, arriving and departing, staying and going, but different and sweeter, and tenderer and more vital by far is the abiding with us of our Lord.

We do not always arise to the hight of our privilege in having with us ever through life's journey, on the highways and the byways, by night and by day, the company of the unseen Christ, an inmate of our own household, strong to comfort, blithe to cheer, sympathetic in sorrow, our guard, our guide, our defender. We think of Christ as our Lord above, to whom we are traveling on pathways arched by the steadfast stars and fragrant with the flowers of love and hope. But Christ is our comrade on the way; in our walks and our talks, in our anxious hours and our weary hours, in our darkness as in our light, Christ is our comrade! Therefore we need never be desolate, though we may now and then be lonely. Therefore we may never fear the tempter, nor be conquered by the sin that doth most easily beset us. For our Christ, dwelling with us and shining through us, shall put the tempter to flight and enable us to trample sin under our feet.

The sense of dominion should come to us as we realize this vital abiding of the Christ in our lives. The child of the King, albeit in rags and squalor, should keep some memory of the Father's house and the Father's state. The child of the King in the palace, with the King smiling upon him, should bear himself royally and give largesse of good to all he meets and overrule all which fights against the kingdom. What means our dear Lord when he tells us, "The kingdom of heaven is within you," but that wherever we are, we are to carry the light and the song of the palace, the joy of the festival, the power to dismiss doubt, to disarm enmity, to win those who are estranged and hostile, and bring them into peaceful harmony with the divine order?

Little can the temporary frictions and petty disturbances and small disappointments of the moment affect our constant happiness if the kingdom of heaven is within us and the Christ dwells in our hearts.

This serene acceptance of the dear Lord as closely and intimately united with ourselves should make us potential when we commend our blessed religion, our religion of blessing, to others who do not know its mysteries or appreciate its privileges. It should indeed make us irresistible, and it is because we but half apprehend the precious truth that Christ cannot be divided from us, that our power is so sporadic, so ineffectual. For, closing around us in serried ranks, are those who are in opposition to all that is hallowed, those who are skeptical and lack vision, those who are grief-stricken and deaf to heavenly melodies, those who are indifferent and need to be aroused.

We cannot reach as we would like to any of these classes, for the reason that we carry to them too little of the Christ. The little we do carry blesses and uplifts them, but we do not carry enough. For the clear shining of the light which our Lord gives us is obscured by our own selfishness, our want of humility, our faltering faith, or our disobedience to the orders which come to us from above. Half-hearted service so weakens us that we do not carry our light of love as we might into the dark places of the earth. Impatience and self seeking and low ideals alienate those who are looking for the Christ, but cannot find him, in the lives we show them.

You take your lantern and wrap a blanket around it and no one sees the flame though it may still feebly burn. You light your lamp and shade it with dark paper or thick horn and the spark or taper sheds only a faint glow. But around the starry light let there be a pellucid porcelain shade, and the steady radiance is an illumination which penetrates the surrounding gloom and lights homeward the feet of the returning child.

NINA

BY AGNES L. PRATT

A long trail of yellow, sandy road crawled up the treeless hill and disappeared around the corner beyond the house. There was neither sidewalk nor footpath. Travelers, what few there were, walked in the middle of the road. Sun-baked and storm-beaten, the house stood in the midst of the uninviting landscape, a drab patch on a too realistic representation of colorless discord. Only the sky, far above, reflected the tints of sunset, was drenched in the blue of June days or shadowed by drear November weather. The landscape beneath suffered but little change.

The house door was open, but nearly all the windows were closed. And the windows were steamy. They were always so, because there was always something boiling on the stove. A swift, brushing noise mingled with the steady hum of flies, and presently a woman swept a cloud of dust out into the barren dooryard. Particles of it settled on the clothing of a man who was dragging himself up the steep incline to the doorway. A child's cry drowned for a moment the loudly buzzing insects and something the man may have addressed to her, and the woman turned and entered the steamy atmosphere within. Presently the man's figure darkened the narrow doorway.

"Hot, ain't it?" he said, sitting down in the door and taking long puffs at the burning pipe in his mouth.

"Hot? Well, I should say so! I'm nearly roasted here, washin', bilin' and tendin' Nina all to once."

Stooping, she picked up the empty dinner pail he had placed just inside the door.

"I shan't need that again right away," observed the man between his puffs; "shop's shut down."

"Strike?" asked the woman, dully, and a note of weariness crept into the strident voice.

"No." He paused, removed the pipe from his mouth and then continued: "Ain't any orders. Been workin' on goods that wasn't ordered, an' now they've shut down. For good," he added as an afterthought.

"For good." The woman echoed his words regretfully, then turned away from the steaming kettle she was uncovering to ask, "What'll we do?"

"I dunno. Live on what I can raise, I reckon."

Then he turned a contemplative face toward the western sky, where a gorgeous sunset was doing its utmost to beautify with weird tints of Oriental splendor the lifeless scene beneath it. Brown, sunburnt fields where a few unharvested vegetables still scorched beneath the autumn sun, stone walls straggling here and there through acres of stubble and unprofitable pasture land, great ledges of copper-colored rocks, glistening now like molten gold, but valueless, and nearer by the sandy, sinuous yellow road and the drab unblinded house, a blot even on its uncongenial surroundings.

The woman inside hurried the supper out of the way, brushed the crumbs that had fallen from the table out through the open door, and hushed the little one to sleep in her cradle. Then she dropped listlessly on to the doorstone vacated by her husband, and folding a corner of her wet, soiled apron between her fingers, fanned herself and thought. Fanned herself unconsciously and thought, almost unconsciously, too, of the home of her youth, better than this, of the few happy experiences of her married life, and then of what it had come to. It had come to this.

A few salty tears splashed down onto the damp apron, and a hard look, born of the landscape and her environments, settled in the tired eyes. And the thought, the impulse that grew in her consciousness that night was born, too, of that dull, barren landscape and her environments. It was a thought that, conceived on the unfruitful hillside, could only be executed in the midst of the life and excitement of the city, whose distant turrets were dimly gleaming beyond the copper rocks and the stubbly pasture. Temptation has its birth in the human heart from the faintest thought waves, the almost imperceptible impulses that hardly formulate themselves in words, but only act on the sensitive inner mind as exhilarating emotion. But from this, the seed, bursts the crimson flower, vigorous and ripe. It takes time, too. Seeds cannot take root and bloom in an hour. When it was all over, she could hardly realize how she had done it, or why. It seemed, now that she was found out, so small a thing to do, and the punishment was so great. She was dimly conscious, through her great agony, that she had wanted to do something for Nina, that somehow it would make her child happier and prettier, more like other babies. That was how she accounted for it as she sat alone in the cell where they had taken her when it was found out. She had thought it would be so easy. No one would ever know, no one but herself and God, and she had never troubled herself very much about God. He was a visionary tyrant, who gave everything to the rich and took no notice whatever of the poor. She wondered, dully, if God had really seen her, as she had read long ago in Sunday school books that he did, and if he cared.

"I guess not," she said aloud, and she laughed.

In the morning when she was arraigned for trial the man she called her husband came.

"Well," he said, coldly and sternly, "you've done well, hain't you?"

She hung her head and was silent. The burden of her own guilt and his reproaches were too heavy for her to bear. After a long silence, when he had turned his eyes away, she spoke.

"You'll take good care of Nina?"

"Yes," he replied, still coldly, "and teach her to forget her mother if I can."

"I done it for her," moaned the woman, helplessly.

"You'd better left it undone, then," said the man, unfeelingly, as he turned away.

"Mary Campbell, shoplifting; one year," was the way she was registered in the matron's book at the woman's prison. At first she thought she would go mad, and gave the attendants no end of trouble. Then she submitted passively to the inevitable. It was the only way. A rigid routine of work comprised her days until Sunday. Then she went to the chapel with the rest. But the words of the good man who spoke and the majestic music of the choir fell dully on her ears. They were all too far away, too good to affect her much. If she could see Nina, hold her in her arms just once more, that might count. Nothing else did. And he had never given her word nor sign that all was well with them. She did not hear the meaningless sentences echoing through the still room. Her eyes roved away from the sanctified face of the preacher and sought other points of interest. A window on one side of the chapel attracted her attention with its stained glass picture. It was a man, and in his arms he held a little child.

"That might be Nina," she murmured, softly, and then—"it is Christ." Suddenly, from somewhere outside, the brilliant sunlight burst into the room. It shone through the transparent features of the Christ in the window, glorifying, illuminating them, until they beamed with human tenderness and pity. Curiously the woman gazed. Sermon, music were forgotten. In the dim light the face had only been to her a picture, cold, responseless to the dull aching of her heart. Now it shone upon her, tender, sympathetic and kind, and she murmured to herself, "It never seemed like that before."

A quick touch on her shoulder aroused her, and she arose to follow the matron from the room. But the face of the Christ went with her, glorified and tender, the only human face she had seen since she could remember.

When the year was out she passed out of the institution alone, and returned to the world unwelcomed. Back to her home she went, to the drab house on the hillside. With beating heart she knocked and waited. Would he let her come back to Nina? A woman she had never seen before opened the door.

"Where is my baby? Where is Nina?" she asked, breathlessly.

"Inside," said the woman, briefly. "We expected you."

For a few moments the mother love held sway. She fondled and caressed the tiny hands, the shining head, murmuring meanwhile heart-broken endearments to the wondering baby. Then she turned again to the stranger.

"Is he here—my husband?"

"He is dead."

The reply was short and comprehensive.

"Dead!"

She echoed the words, looking about her apprehensively.

"Yes, dead. We are all liable to die. He took sick a month back an' died last week. His life was insured," she added, as a comforting afterthought.

For a moment the mother's head drooped over her child. Then she looked up.

"He would have kept Nina from me if he had lived," she said. "I am glad he is dead."

The woman turned away a shocked face and looked out across the russet fields and copper rocks. Then a sudden memory of the Christ face, glorious in its tenderness, came to the mother, and holding the slight form of her baby tighter, she sobbed, "No, I ain't neither. I wish he could lived and seen how much different I could been."

Then after a short silence she asked, "Is the money—did he give it to Nina?"

"Yes."

When darkness fell over the barren hillside mother and child sat alone in the little kitchen. The child's yellow hair fell over the woman's arms, gleaming softly like an aureole in the moonlight that flooded the room, the woman's face above it dark, solemn and resolute. She looked out at the desolate hillside, not through the little panes of greenish glass, but through a stained glass window where the Christ's face was quickened to eternal life by God's refulgent sunlight, and she wept. Year in and year out she and Nina lived there on the bleak hillside, and she worked early and late for the child. Not one cent of the insurance money did she touch, but it lay in the bank accumulating for Nina.

Years passed. The golden-haired baby grew to womanhood, brown-haired and wistful-eyed. The little house was no longer a drab spot on the landscape, but glistened white and spotless in the sunlight. Cool, green blinds shaded its windows, and a little piazza furnished support for the pretty vines that clambered over it. Flowers turned their faces up to the sunlight and fields of profitable vegetation lay all about, hiding almost the copper rocks and the stubbly pasture land. Still the yellow, sandy road crawled by the corner, and the brilliant sunset drenched the azure skies in crimson till they shone purple and gorgeous on the horizon.

Then into Nina's life came romance. Prince Charming, in whatever guise, never lingers long away from a maiden's virgin fancy, and with the ripening grain and mellow fruit came the consummation of their hopes, the betrothal. One day he came to the mother.

"I want to see you," he said, quickly, "is Nina here?"

"No," was the reply, "she is not. What do you want of me?"

"Is it true, this story they tell of you?" gasped the young man, almost fiercely.

"Is what true?"

The woman leaned against the table and pressed one hand convulsively over her heart.

"Is what true?" she repeated, hoarsely.

"That you are a convict."

Pale to the lips and stern, he waited for the answer. But none came. Still he waited. Outside a few belated flies buzzed industriously. A dark cloud gathered on the horizon, and the copper rocks looked damp and green-hued in the distance. Then the young man raised his head and addressed her.

"I must have been a baby," he said, coldly, "when it happened. But they tell me, you know there are always those kind enough to spoil your happiness, they tell me you served a year in the woman's prison for stealing."

"Shoplifting," she corrected him, quickly and almost unconsciously.

"Then it is true."

He turned a boyish, scornful face upon her. Then dropping into a chair he covered his face with his hands and between his sobs cried out, "Why didn't you tell me? What did you let me go on loving Nina for, when you knew—O, you knew I could never marry her?"

His childish grief vented itself in great, gasping sobs, but at the last words the woman went down on her knees at his feet and clasping her hands over his knee said, imploringly, "O don't, don't say that! I can't see my Nina, my pretty one, killed for her mother's sin. For God's sake take that back! I will go away. I will kill myself. She shall never know what became of me. O, anything but that!" Tears streamed from the woman's eyes, but she continued: "Don't give her up for that! She is innocent, pure as a dove, and she don't know I done it. Don't tell her! It would kill her!"

"I don't care."

The boy doggedly put her clasped hands off from his knees, and rose to his feet.

"You don't stop to think," he said, thickly, "that you have ruined me. I shall never love anybody but Nina."

"Then marry her," the mother interrupted, eagerly, "I will never trouble you. I will go away."

"Everybody knows it," he muttered, sullenly, "everybody but Nina."

"But they won't tell her," she pleaded, "and—and I have tried to live it down."

Like one awaiting sentence she stood before him. But he turned toward the door.

"I can't," he said, almost roughly, "let me go."

Framed in the dull painted doorway, her eyes alight with tenderness and love, stood Nina, barring his progress.

"Mother," she called, softly.

And the poor woman who had just heard the stern decree lifted her eyes and saw her. "It is the Christ," she muttered, vaguely.

"No," the rich young voice rang out, "it is I, mother, Nina. I heard it all. I know how you sinned, how you have suffered. Let him go. What is his love to yours? To yours, the love that has toiled, suffered and sacrificed, aye! even sinned, for its own! Come, mother."

The woman took one step forward and was clasped in the waiting arms. Suddenly the thunder clouds parted, the sun burst through and lighted the humble room with its radiance, making a glittering halo about the head of the young girl bent above the bowed form of the weeping woman.

To the young man standing near, dully comprehending yet not fully understanding, it seemed dimly as if the woman's words were true, and it was indeed the Christ, compassionate and kind, who glorified the complete forgiveness accorded the sinner.

For henceforth the barren hills were beautiful, the copper rocks and stubbly pastures gleamed like the "city of gold," and the dusty, sandy road led away in very truth, for these two, mother and child, in their perfect understanding, to other and brighter scenes, where awaited them, in the fullness of time, a happiness that no memories of the past could mar, for it was of pure gold. And ever, for that repentant heart, shines at all critical periods of her life, the Christ face, compassionate and tender.

HYMN

[Written by Mary Chandler Jones for the meeting of the Woman's Home Missionary Association in Lowell, Mass., April 28]

King of the springtime, at thy word
The golden seed was sown;
Now we thy last command have heard,
"Go, garner in mine own."

Through summer sun and summer rain
The fields afar, anear,
Are white with autumn's ripened grain—
Lord of earth's fullness, hear.

Master of harvest, send, O send
Thy willing reapers forth,
Before the summer days shall end,
Or winds blow from the north.

And unto us who may not go,
Grant still our part to bear,
That we the harvest joy may know,
The reapers' singing share.

For not alone in far-off lands
The shining harvest waits;
Christ put thy sickle in our hands
To reap beside our gates.

A WORD TO YOUNG TRAVELERS

BY ELIZABETH FIELD

It happened a good many years ago now, for I was a girl only sixteen when my father went to the train with me late one bright winter's morning. I was going alone from Boston to New York for the first time—one of my girl friends journeying as far as Springfield, leaving me to take the rest of the trip entirely by myself. Many had been the careful warnings given me by my mother, which I duly scorned with the superiority of youth, as I felt quite competent to take a trip to Europe alone, and, in fact, I highly enjoyed the situation.

It was a beautiful morning I remember, and as the train rolled out of the station I settled back in my chair with a thrill of pride, and the delightful consciousness of at last being considered old enough to take care of myself. Such a good time as we had, my little friend and I, and many were the looks of amused interest cast at us from time to time by our fellow-travelers at the sound of our happy schoolgirl talk and laughter. Springfield came only too soon, and I was beginning to feel just a little lonely and forlorn, and to wish the distance between Springfield and New York not quite so great, when, to my amazement, a gentleman came slowly down the car aisle and stood before me.

"Pardon me, is not your name Miss F——?" he asked, courteously, and at my cool bow (for I remembered my warnings) he proceeded: "I knew your mother very well when she was a girl; you look much like her."

I began to get interested, but he did not wait for a reply. "She was Nan Reed of Lynn. Many a time I used to pull her curls in school; it doesn't seem possible that she has a daughter your age."

I was delighted, and thought how pleased my little mother would be to hear again from her old friend.

"Did you move away from Lynn?" I ventured to ask, whereupon the gentleman inquired if he might occupy my friend's chair for a few minutes and find out about his old acquaintances.

All that my mother had said floated vaguely through my mind, but of course she couldn't know I was going to meet such an old, old friend of hers—such a dear, fatherly sort of man.

When he had comfortably settled himself he told me all about his schooldays in Lynn, of my pretty little mother, and many of her old friends whom I knew quite well. After he was married and moved away, he said, he had lost all track of his schoolmates, but he was so glad to revive the old friendship again in so pleasant a way. Then he told me about his own life, which seemed to have been filled with sorrow, and, when he went back to his former seat to get a picture of his little motherless girl, I was justly indignant when the conductor of the car came up and asked me if I had known the man before.

The afternoon sped by on wings. He had brought me, with the picture, a box of candy, asking if I had inherited my mother's love for sweets, and we talked and laughed over the bonbons like a couple of children. Just before we reached New York he pulled out his cardcase and wrote on a blank card: "I am so glad to have met your charming daughter, and to hear your life has been so full of sunshine. Your old friend, B. J. Phillips." I have that card now.

When I began to gather up my things he asked if any one would meet me, and if they didn't might he get me a carriage. "It would be very kind of him," I said, and almost hoped my uncle wouldn't appear.

We were steaming into the station when the conductor came up again and took my satchel. "O, but the gentleman is going to get me a carriage," I said, smiling at his stupidity.

"My dear young lady," the conductor said gravely, "your father put you into my care—and I have a daughter of my own. I shall either see you under your uncle's protection or put you into a carriage myself."

Can't you imagine my surprise and injured dignity? I turned round to make a protest to my new friend, but he had gone—vanished completely.

My anger and discomfiture seems laughable now, as I followed my self appointed guardian to the platform, where every rebellious feeling disappeared in the happiness of seeing my uncle and favorite cousin again.

My mother had never even heard of the man—the name on the card was of course fictitious. He must have heard enough of our girlish talk before my friend left me to concoct his plausible story, with the aid of a good memory, as he must have known something of the Lynn young people in the days long since gone by.

The conductor told my father afterward that he felt the man was an impostor, and was truly frightened when he saw my implicit belief in him.

I shudder now when I look back on that journey, and only hope my portrayal of it may hinder some other self-confident young girl in her travels from undergoing a similar experience.

Closet and Altar

Your life needs days of retirement, when it shuts the gates upon the noisy whirl of action and is alone with God.

I take it that a great part of this earthly tuition and discipline is not more to work out the evil that is in us than to prepare us to receive what God has in readiness to give us. I cannot otherwise interpret the great and terrible withholding seen in the vast majority of lives; this fearful negative must mean a gracious positive.—T. T. Munger.

Although we turn us from thy face,
  And wander wide and long,
Thou holdest us still in thy embrace,
  O love of God most strong!
—Eliza Scudder.

Thank God that we shall never come to any level, however high, where we can rest in ourselves and feel him no longer above us who is himself our heaven. We know that we shall be seeking him and finding him forever and forever, growing into his infinity as it hightens and broadens and deepens beyond us.—Lucy Larcom.

The love of Jesus Christ is to be seen in that warm affection for him which leads the faithful to wish that his soul may become almost a part of that of Christ, and that the living principle in the Lord may be reproduced in himself, not in the way of an external image but as an inward and divine inspiration. This love is omnipotent, uniting the creature with the Creator. Man, in fact, rises continually from humanity to something divine when he is animated by this love, which is the sweetest of all affections, penetrates the soul, acquires a mastery over the body, and causes the faithful to walk on earth, rapt as it were in the spirit.—Savonarola.

O, what a load of struggle and distress
Falls off before the cross! The feverish care,
The wish that we were other than we are,
The sick regrets, the yearnings numberless,
The thought, "This might have been," so apt to press
On the reluctant soul; even past despair,
Past sin itself, all, all is turned to fair,
Aye, to a scheme of ordered happiness,
So soon as we love God, or, rather, know
That God loves us!
—C. H. Townshend.

Most holy God! let not the largeness of our sins and errors make us forget the largeness of thy mercy; our great need the greatness of thy supply. Teach us to trust in thy love. Help us when we seem to be orphans in this world that grinds on with such sternness of unbroken law. Comfort us if in the midst of the vastness of thy kingdom we cannot help thinking we are forgotten; if our poor cry seems unable to pierce through the rolling majesty of thy worlds. In the hours of our pain and passion and sorrow, in our lonely and forsaken days, let the Good Shepherd come unto us, for he knoweth his sheep by name. Forgive our sins and let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us; such beauty as we can bear, not the burning beauty of thy brightness and thy majesty, for we are all too weak and feeble for that, but the gentle beauty of thy holiness and purity. Hear our prayers through thy dear Son, Jesus Christ. Amen.

Mothers in Council

O Lord, I have come into my closet and shut the door, that I may be alone with thee for a little. O wilt thou meet me and give me a sweet sense of thy presence, and let me know thou art near to hear the petitions I bring thee. I thank thee for thy love, so rich and abounding, which yearns over me unceasingly. I thank thee for thy tender sympathy, which reaches down to all the varying circumstances of my daily life, bringing needed help and peace. I thank thee that thou dost understand the desires and longings of my heart before I have ventured to express them in words, and that sometimes thou dost answer before I call. Bless me in my home, and in the conduct of my family duties. Bless the dear children thou hast given me, and lead them in unerring ways of obedience and love, and hold them in right paths. May they love thee and count thee as their best Friend, and strive to please thee in all they do, day by day. So may our entire household rejoice in thee, and find it our supreme joy to follow thee in ways of praise and service, for Christ's sake. Amen.

NATURE'S INFLUENCE ON CHILDHOOD

They drive home the cows from the pastures
  Up through the long, shady lane,
Where the quail whistles loud in the wheatfields
  That are yellow with ripening grain.
. . . .
The pen of the author and scholar—
  The noble and wise of the land—
The chisel, the sword and the palette
  Shall be held in the little brown hand.

With the few exceptions that prove the rule, our greatest men have been those whose childhood has had the sweet and deep experiences that the country gives. There seems to be a tenderness and nobility, a sensitiveness and depth of thought brought by companionship with nature, the full development of which is choked by the artificial surroundings of stone and brick. Compare a child's daily experience in the city with that narrated by Coleridge when he first climbed the mountain near his home and saw the view around him:

Dim coasts and cloud-like hills and shoreless ocean—
It seemed like Omnipresence. God methought
Had built him there a temple.
. . . .
Blest hour! It was a luxury—to be!

Mingling in the world is undoubtedly necessary for full development, but when the soul is young the simplicity and power of God's works, untouched by man, speak true things and give the nourishment that makes strong and beautiful qualities. Many a troublesome question would be solved could all childhood stand,

Watching the coming of the twilight on,
As if it were a new and perfect world,
And this were its first eve. How beautiful
Must be the work of nature to a child
In its first, fresh impression!

For the child who lives near nature's heart there are the time for thought and the breadth of view that develop what is only waiting to be touched that it may spring into being. The wish that is often the beginning of a purpose that makes life a success comes in its sweetest, strongest power when nature is near to help. The summer day, the floating cloud and whispering breeze, the immensity of the round, blue sky bring deep and blessed thoughts. There are life lessons learned in the night, when darkness and solitude make the neighboring lights twinkle cheerily, when home seems a haven from all dangers, and the stars send down from the great unknown a message that fills the soul with wonder.

The show, the rivalry and struggle that the child in the city soon sees teach a different lesson from that of the calm, quiet woods, where the dropping nut and the rustling leaves just stir the silence. There would be more of gentleness and sincerity could all—men and women too—have opportunity for meditation in the woods that are

Fit shrine for humble worshiper to hold
Communion with his Maker Here are seen
No traces of man's pomp or pride; no silks
Rustle, no jewels shine, nor envious eyes
Encounter; no fantastic carvings show
The boast of our vain race, to change the form
Of thy fair works. But thou art here—thou fill'st
The solitude.

George Bancroft, in writing of Washington's character, speaks of his going into the wilderness as a surveyor when he was sixteen years old and of his experience in that calling for three years. Of its influence on Washington he says, "The forest trained him in meditative solitude to freedom and largeness of mind, and nature revealed to him her obedience to serene and silent laws." Webster, in touch with nature from his childhood, was imbued with its grandeur and loveliness. "The breath of the pine woods of New England, the exhilarating ocean breeze, in some mysterious way stole into his profoundest arguments addressed to the Senate or the Supreme Court," says E. P. Whipple.

Our poets are full of the recollections of early days spent, as it seems that God meant them to be, in nearness to his works. When they tell what the country child has it appears as if he revels in the richness of life that the child in the city but touches. Bryant and R. H. Dana contrast the city with the country and the thoughts of each are along the same line. Bryant says:

Here I have 'scaped the city's stifling heat
Its horrid sounds and its polluted air;
And, where the season's milder fervors beat,
And gales, that sweep the forest borders, bear
The song of bird and sound of running stream,
Have come again to wander and to dream.

Dana's words are:

These are the murmuring waters, these the flowers
I mused o'er in my earlier, better hours.
. . . .
Ye were as living, conscious beings, then,
With whom I talked—but I have talked with men;
With uncheered sorrow, with cold hearts I've met;
Seen honest minds by hardened craft beset,
Seen hope cast down, turn deathly pale its glow,

Longfellow goes back half sadly to the thoughts and longings that were recalled in connection with the beauties that his boyhood days had seen:

And Deering's woods are fresh and fair,
And with joy that is almost pain
My heart goes back to wander there,
And among the dreams of the days that were,
I find my lost youth again.
And the strange and beautiful song,
The groves are repeating it still:
A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts.

The purity and sweetness of childhood days spent as Lowell's were is emphasized when he sings of the wayside dandelion:

My childhood's earliest thoughts are linked with thee;
The sight of thee calls back the robin's song,
Who, from the dark, old tree
Beside the door, sang clearly all day long,
And I, secure in childish piety
Listened as if I heard an angel sing
With news from heaven, which he could bring
Fresh every day to my untainted ears,
Where birds and flowers and I were happy peers.

Perhaps no one has so fully expressed the joys and abounding richness of the country child's life as Whittier has. A city child seems a pauper when such wealth is set forth.

I was rich in flowers and trees,
Humming birds and honey bees;
For my sport the squirrel played,
Plied the snouted mole his spade;
For my taste the blackberry cone
Purpled over hedge and stone;
Laughed the brook for my delight
Through the day and through the night.
. . . .
I was monarch; pomp and joy
Waited on the barefoot boy.

Is there anything that can compensate for the loss of such experiences? There is deep significance in the fact that to one person a bunch of lilacs is associated with the discouraged looking men who year after year clamor for customers, while to another it recalls green fields and birds and the old home, where, beside the door, stood the lilac bush that spoke so early of the joys of spring.

The Conversation Corner

THE OLD FLAG must float over the Corner at least once a year—either on Washington's Birthday, Patriots' Day, Memorial Day or Fourth of July. (Last year we had it up after presidential election.) So many of these April days are patriotic anniversaries, I will ask D. F. to hoist it this week, in memory of the Firing on Sumter and the Great Uprising in 1861, of the Surrender at Appomattox and the Assassination of Lincoln in 1865, of the beginning of the Revolution in 1775, and of General Grant's birthday~~, which is~~ to be grandly celebrated at his tomb on the Hudson during the week when you read this. I think my letters—which I have succeeded with some difficulty in pulling out, one by one, from under Kitty Clover, fast asleep on my table—have a suitably patriotic ring.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Dear Mr. Martin: I have never written to the Corner before, but I think I must now to disagree with Agnes C. [see Corner of March 4] in regard to our White House. I live in Washington and I think the White House is a beautiful building. I don't think another would be nearly as artistic, and as far as another place is concerned nothing can surpass the White House grounds. As you say, no one has ever refused to live in it, and no doubt Mr. McKinley is proud to occupy it. No, as long as I live, I hope the presidents will live in our pretty White House.

SILVIA C.

MASSACHUSETTS.

. . . Some time ago the Washington correspondent mentioned the fact that men of that city cannot vote for President. Please tell me why. I do not see why as residents of Virginia they are not entitled to vote.

MISS B.

The principal reason "why" is that they are not residents of Virginia any more than you or I are. Washington is a Federal city, that is, belonging as the national capital to the nation and under control of the national legislature. (See Constitution of United States, Art. I., Sec. 8, last clause but one.) In my boyhood we used to learn that the District of Columbia was ten miles square—that is, contained 100 square miles—the same having been granted for the purpose of a capital by Maryland and Virginia. But somewhere about that time (I will not state the date) the portion on the west side of the Potomac was given back—"retroceded" was the exact word—to Virginia, so that now the district covers only sixty-four square miles. It is governed by commissioners appointed by Congress. Since the war Washington has been immensely improved, so that now in its government buildings, as well as in its parks and roads, it is a magnificent city, worthy of the far-seeing man for whom it was named and who laid it out on the banks of the Potomac a hundred years ago. Whether the residents can vote in city affairs or not, I am not sure; we must refer that to Silvia.

Speaking about the right to vote, a lady happened to tell me this morning of a little boy who put up his hand in a children's missionary meeting, when an account of a mission among the Indians was given, to ask whether Indians could vote. No one could answer. Can you? The Constitution, Amendment XIV., speaks of "excluding Indians not taxed." All persons born in the United States are citizens, and the next Amendment declares that no citizens shall be denied the right to vote on account of race or color. But are the Indians of the territories or reservations "born in the United States"? I suppose Evan and Dorothy in the Fort Berthold Reservation can expound that part of the Constitution to us.

Speaking of the Constitution, I am glad that the authors of that great instrument misspelled "tranquility" in the first sentence, for it has secured several dollars to our two Corner Funds—for Pomiuk and the Armenian Orphans—in connection with my offer of a premium for "silver certificates" containing that extract! Here are specimens from two States which were Territories when some of our readers studied geography:

NEBRASKA.

. . . In the Corner of March 4 I notice the remarks about the "Tranquility one dollar bills." As I happen to have one, I will inclose it for the Armenian Orphan Fund.

MICHIGAN.

. . . In order to insure greater "tranquility" of mind in my own case, I send you a "new one dollar bill" for the Armenian Orphan Fund.

Here is a letter from another State not dreamed of in my boyhood:

GREELEY, COL.

Dear Mr. Martin: I thank you for your letter and the certificate and for the picture of poor Pomiuk. I like to hear about him, and I hope he will get well. My brother Warren and I are going to save some of our nickels and send for him. My Grandpa P—— is a Congregational minister, and his mother's name was K——, from Brockton, Mass. [O, yes, we know about those old families!—MR. M.] Greeley is a nice place, and I wish you would come here again and see our pleasant avenues, but there are very few prairie dogs here now! We voted for McKinley last fall, and are glad we did. Your little friend,

JULIA C.

A Worcester County boy, now an honorary member in California and an old veteran of the War of the Rebellion, happens to mention a bit of experience under the Flag:

. . . Now I want to know how you ever knew that I was a member of the McClellan Dragoons in the Army of the Potomac. I certainly was, and was with McClellan in the three months' service in West Virginia in the "Chicago Dragoons," and then in the Army of the Potomac. Was wounded in a skirmish the day before the main fight at Williamsburg, in '63 was with Stoneman on his raid at the time of the battle of Chancellorsville, and was taken prisoner while we were making our way to our lines, over in King and Queen County, right by the Court House. I was given a free ride into Richmond on the cars from White House Landing on the Pamunkey, and boarded a week at the "Libby Hotel" at the expense of the Southern Confederacy, when, with hundreds of others, I was sent home. In the spring of '64 our regiment was sent to New Orleans, a part of the regiment taking part in helping General Banks "let go" of the rebel army up the Red River.

No doubt some of your fathers or grandfathers will hear you read this and say: "I was one of those dragoons;" "I was on that raid;" "I stopped at that hotel, too;" "I was up the Red River!"

Last of all is a letter about children engaged in fighting and that in connection with the war in Europe!

NORTH BROOKFIELD, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: . . . I am going to tell you how my sister and myself play Concert of Powers. Almost every morning before Mary and I make the beds we have a pillow fight. Now we have turned our sham fight into the Concert of Powers. Helen, who is five years old, is poor little Greece, Mary is Turkey, Carolyn is Germany, papa is Great Britain and I am Russia. First Turkey and Greece come out, Turkey with three pillows and Greece with two. While they are fighting Russia and Germany come in with their pillows. After we have fought quite a while Great Britain comes and we all run, throwing pillows right and left. We have a tiger cat named McKinley and a gray squirrel named Dickie.

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK

The Blackberry Girl. Since the query and answer about this old poem were printed in the Corner of Feb. 18, I have received several letters referring to it, one of which communicates additional information of interest as to the authoress.

TAUNTON, MASS.

. . . Mrs. Sproat, the author of "Stories for Children," of which "The Blackberry Girl" was one, was my grandfather's sister, and I knew her well in my young days. Her maiden name was Nancy Dennis, her family coming to Taunton from Newport during the Revolutionary War. She was born in 1766 and in 1788 married Hon. James Sproat, for many years clerk of the Courts in Bristol County. They had a large and lovely family of children, and a delightful home; the house is still standing on the high ground south of St. Thomas's Church. Mrs Sproat's poems were written for the benefit of her own children and at the time were almost the only books of a religious tendency which children could understand. "The Blackberry Girl" became a great favorite and was not only printed in the book of "Stories for Children" but on handkerchiefs and aprons and sent all over the country as then known In The Congregationalist of Feb. 25, the little poem, commencing "How pleasant is Saturday night," is also Mrs. Sproat's taken from "Short Songs for Little Children," a little square book—mine was covered with yellow paper. Mrs Sproat died in 1826, universally lamented. Several of her grandchildren and great-grandchildren are now living in Taunton.

MRS E.

The multitude of people who remember reading in childhood, "Why, Phebe, are you come so soon," will be glad to know these facts about its authorship. I am specially glad to learn who wrote the lines which in thousands of minds are pleasantly associated with "Saturday Night," and also to have the opportunity to correct a misprint in the second verse, where the third line should read,

That we may have rest from our work.

A gentleman of quick ear and long memory whom I always see in the Congregational House was much exercised that this mistake should have been made, thus confusing those who wished to recall the verses. I do not know what he would have done to D. F., had he met him in the corridor. I hope he did not meet him, for with all his faults this may not have been his error, but the proof-reader's, or —my typewriter's!

Other Old Folks' Letters. That our occasional use of this column in the interest of old folks' queries gives pleasure to a wide circle of readers is abundantly proved by the responses from all parts of the land. Here are specimens—as many as the column will hold.

FULLERTON, CAL.

. . . I committed "The Blackberry Girl" to memory and rehearsed it in school when a child. Now I am an old grandmother, living on borrowed time, and as the words, after lying dormant in my brain so many years, were recalled with scarcely an effort, I said to myself, surely, nothing is lost.

MRS. W.

OMAHA, NEB.

. . . Some one has kindly sent me a copy of March 4 of The Congregationalist, for which I am very thankful, as I never see a paper that I enjoy reading quite as well as that paper. I am so glad to have "The Old Fashioned Bible" for my Scrap-book. I am getting so that I think a paper does not amount to much that doesn't furnish me with one or more pieces for future reading.

Lesson for May 9 — Acts 13: 14-43

PAUL PREACHING TO THE JEWS

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

The intention of Paul and his company was apparently to carry on a missionary tour in Pamphylia. But for some reason that project was for the time abandoned, though later they labored there [Acts 14: 24, 25]. Professor Ramsay, in his volume Saint Paul, the Traveler, expresses the opinion that Paul was taken sick in Perga and determined to seek at once the higher altitude and healthier air of the interior. The journey to Pisidian Antioch, about 100 miles over the mountains, would require a week or more and the path was a perilous one. This city, though much smaller than its namesake in Syria, from which Paul and Barnabas had set forth, has become hardly less famous in Christian history; for here the first distinctly Gentile church was established.

Professor Ramsay has made it plain that this Antioch was in the province of Galatia. Paul's epistle to the churches of this district was therefore written to his first Gentile converts, and it throws much light on the beginning of his ministry there. He was now about forty-four years old, and he seems quickly to have won his way, in spite of his severe illness, into the affections of his hearers [Gal. 4: 13-15]. We learn in this lesson:

I. The true missionary method. Paul was among strangers, seeking a foothold for a new religion. He first emphasized the points which he held in common with the people. He proclaimed himself a Jew. He worshiped in the synagogue of the Jews. He waited there for an invitation to speak. Perhaps he did not receive it for several weeks. But when it came he declared his faith in the God of Israel. He showed his familiarity with the Jewish Scriptures and his confidence in them. He called the Jews his brethren. He got as far as possible on common ground before he began to deliver his special message.

That, I believe, is the method of all successful preachers and teachers. But it is more than a method. It is the prompting of a genuine love, a fellow-feeling that seeks to impart to others some great good for their own sakes and for Christ's sake. Love for him begets this feeling, and the greatest possible service a teacher can render his pupils is to make this feeling strong in them. Paul's example in this respect is admirably described in Dr. Stalker's The Preacher and His Models.

II. The sermon. The outline before us presents:

1. The history of the people of Israel, showing the providence of God guiding them for some great purpose.

2. The promise of the Messiah, who was to be of the seed of David and the deliverer of his people, as Zacharias sang [Luke 1: 68-75].

3. The promise fulfilled in the coming of Jesus, who was introduced by John, the preacher of repentance.

4. The application of this fulfilled promise to those to whom it was proclaimed. "To us is the word of this salvation sent forth."

5. The rejection of this Saviour by the Jews of Jerusalem, his crucifixion and resurrection from the dead.

6. The pledge and assurance in the resurrection of Jesus that all who believed on him should have remission of sins. The law of oses told them what they ought to do, but ould not set them free from the consequences of failing to obey that law. Jesus had brought to them remission of sins through his incarnation, his life and death and resurrection. Trusting in him, though they were sinners, they would be made holy.

7. The danger which these good tidings brought with them. Should they reject this offered salvation they would perish, as their own prophets had foretold. It had been anticipated that some would not receive it when it was offered to them and their fate had been described [vs. 40, 41]. "Beware, therefore," said the preacher; and with that warning he closed.

III. The effect of the sermon. The people were deeply interested. They wanted to hear more of the same things. They invited the apostles to come and preach again the next Sabbath. Many followed Paul and Barnabas and listened to their counsels. The gospel found a warm welcome, though not many days later it had produced divisions, aroused persecution against the preacher, and brought their labors to an end in that place. If we may anticipate these results as they are stated in the next lesson, important truths for personal application will suggest themselves. Some of them are these:

1. The gospel is a simple rehearsal of facts, the chief of which are that God promised to the Jews a Messiah who should bring salvation to all nations; that Jesus is the fulfillment of that promise, who was begotten of the Father through the Holy Spirit, crucified by the Jews, raised from the dead, the Saviour from sin of all who believe on him. He is our Saviour and there is no other Saviour beside him.

2 One may study and teach the Scriptures and yet fail completely to understand them. This was the experience of many Jews in Antioch. They refused to accept the interpretation of truth prompted by the Holy Spirit. Can this be our experience? Not if we study the Scriptures with purpose to know and obey. It is the "despisers" who perish—those who are so fixed in their beliefs that they are not open to new knowledge. Yet such men are not peculiar to any age. We may be religious and yet be unsaved. We may hold to some truths in the Bible and yet reject the Saviour, and lose all the blessings which the Bible proclaims to men.

3. But the truth faithfully and lovingly preached, though it may startle and shock men and rouse their prejudices, will not be in vain. Some ears will be open, some truths will be received and Christ's kingdom will grow. It is always a joy to the disciples of Jesus to proclaim his salvation and to offer to all men newness of life in him.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES

A teacher in the Cuban mission at Tampa, Fla., is to be supported by the Congregational Endeavorers of that State.

During May the World's C. E. Prayer Chain will have for its object the cause of temperance, that the drink traffic everywhere may be destroyed, and that all Christians may labor together for this end.

During its first year the Tremont Temple society, Boston, has sustained a class in Bible history, led by the associate pastor, has furnished two courses of lectures on English literature, has distributed flowers sent by country societies and has published three of the pastor's sermons.

A United Society for India, Burmah and Ceylon was formed in Calcutta, Jan. 29. Its first president is Rev. R. M. Julian, the pastor of the Calcutta church founded by Carey, and the field secretary is Mr. Burges, Sunday school secretary for India, who formed the first C. E. Society in Wales.

A Pennsylvania society was permitted by storekeepers in town to print John 3: 16, together with a notice of the time of its meetings, on the paper bags to be used in putting up goods.

The great Boston C. E. Chorus of nearly 1,000 voices will give a closing concert of the season, May 12, in Tremont Temple, with a program of unusual merit.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF BEEF

The first in the field and still unrivalled

The great chemist Baron JUSTUS VON LIEBIG made the first scientific effort to produce an extract of meat. The result of his efforts he gave to the world under the name of Liebig COMPANY'S Extract of Beef, and to attest its genuineness he authorized this company to use his signature, now familiar to all the world, on the jars of this famous product. PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM

OUR OWN WORK

A Romantic Bequest. The sum of $300 was recently brought into the office of the A. M. A. in Boston, and an interesting story is told of the way the gift happened to be made. It seems that a scrap of paper, yellow with age, has lately been found, a copy of the will of Mary Hall Leonard, an old-time dame of Bridgewater, Mass. Attached to the document is this quaint little codicil: "I always meant that twenty dollars should go into the treasury of the Lord." This devout woman was born in Taunton, Mass., in 1750, and became the wife of Capt. David Leonard, who had been a soldier in the French and Indian War and was one of the Minutemen of the Revolution. She had a warm interest in missionary work, and continued in Christian activities up to her death, at the age of ninety. The discovery of this testamentary desire of a far-back ancestress has led some of her descendants to contribute a generous sum in her memory for the purchase of A. M. A. Jubilee shares. The duties we owe to ancestors are less potent, perhaps, than those due to posterity, but it seems not unfitting sometimes to perform special acts of dutiful remembrance in honor of noble souls among past generations.

A Reform Among Chinese Women. In a chatty letter to The Christian Mirror Miss Mary Morrill describes a series of meetings held during the holiday season at Paotingfu. Particularly noteworthy is the fact that at one session the women's hour was devoted to a discussion regarding foot-binding. Pastor Meng introduced the subject with enthusiasm, and his sister, Mrs. Tu, who was the first woman in the church to unbind her feet, having taken this stand in the face of much opposition, opened the discussion. Two other women made remarks to the point. Some of the men spoke in favor of the reform, and the schoolgirls sang with great zest an anti-foot-binding song, which was heartily applauded. Our missionaries have always taken a decided stand on this matter, and it will be remembered that only girls with natural feet are admitted to the Paotingfu boarding school. That a more enlightened sentiment is growing is evidenced by the fact that there are six women in the church who unbound their feet after they were married.

Revivals in Africa. From all our African stations come reports of an unusual religious interest. We have already recorded the organization of the first church in Gazaland, West Central African Mission. Mr. Currie of the West Central African Mission sends a hopeful account of the band of native evangelists who go out from Chisamba to the neighboring villages twice a week. These young men are well received by the chiefs and their message is heard with respect. In the schools of the Zulu Mission there have been revivals. Mrs. Bridgman, now in her thirty-eighth year of service, has been assisting in the Boys' School at Amanzimtote, and in a recent letter says: "To be situated in the midst of sixty Zulu boys and young men, all under perfect discipline and control and, with few exceptions, eager for instruction, is an opportunity which any missionary might covet. The work was rendered more delightful by a season of special religious interest, which occurred near the beginning of the term. The whole school was moved and every boy came out on the Lord's side. We could not know that there was really a change of heart with every one, but it was worth a great deal to have every boy committed on the right side. There were sixty who had their home in Jubilee Hall, fifty-five of the number being normal school boys." Mrs. Bridgman also gives an account of a visit to her old station, Umzumbe. She was much impressed with the improved condition of things among the young people. Instead of parties and dances and night singing, there is regular and respectful attendance at religious meetings, and a spirit of quiet earnestness prevails. The inquirers' class connected with the church is large, and recently a very decided religious interest has been manifest among the children in the station school.

THE WORLD AROUND

Appeal for the Soudan. By the victories of the Royal Niger Company in the Nupé territory on the Upper Niger a slave-raiding kingdom has been brought into subjection, an oppressed people delivered and British prestige, carrying with it security to life and property, open highways and the development of trade, has been established and will be extended, not only in Nupé, but throughout the vast countries of the Hausas and Bornus. This means an almost unparalleled missionary opportunity, and Bishop Tugwell has published a challenge to Christian England to supply men and means to enable him to enter Hausaland and plant missions. It is twenty-two years this month since Stanley wrote his challenge to the Church of England regarding Uganda, with the result that difficulties and dangers have been encountered and triumphs achieved over which the world marvels. Here is a new country, far more favorably situated, with a population numbering, it is said, some fifteen millions, having a vernacular character and literature of their own, with communications as traders and travelers with the Mediterranean seaboard and with the west coast The C. M. S. now has two missionaries in Lokoja. Bishop Tugwell calls for a band of twenty or thirty men and a sum of $50,000 to $75,000.

FRESH FACTS

Our new missionary periodical, Congregational Work, reports a paid-up subscription list of 100,000 names. Over 20,000 subscribers are in Massachusetts and over 10,000 in Connecticut.

The American Missionary for April is especially attractive, and Secretary Beard's illustrated article, Sketches from the South, deserves a wide reading. We never saw brighter, more intelligent-looking Negro faces than are pictured in the groups of students in Straight University and Brewer Normal School.

The Presbyterian Board regards this as a peculiarly favorable time for beginning missionary operations in Venezuela, and has transferred two of its South American missionaries to Caracas. Valuable preparatory work has already been done the past eight or nine years by agents of the American Bible Society, and the attitude of the government is liberal and friendly.

The publication in one of the English magazines of the journal of a missionary in the Arctic regions appears at a time when Dr. Nansen's book is exciting much attention. We are reminded that for Christ's sake men and women are not merely traveling for a few months, but dwelling year after year amid the rigors and privations of the Arctic climate.

Cape Colony seems to have a "Sheats Law." Dr. Muir, the superintendent-general of education, has issued his fiat that no white pupils who are being educated at the same institutions with native pupils are to be admitted to the government examinations. At the last government examination at Lovedale fourteen white students were ordered by the inspector to retire as ineligible under the new regulation.

The Church Missionary Society has decided that it is not desirable that a medical missionary should be ordained. Moreover, in the future the society is prepared to extend to women candidates who desire a medical training the same privileges offered to men. This is a progressive step on the part of the conservative British organization.

In view of the interest which centers in the Balkan peninsula, Life and Light for April, with its interesting articles on Albania, Macedonia and Bulgaria, is particularly timely.

The old building at Bebels, which Dr. Hamlin used for his theological seminary, has been purchased by a German relief committee to be used as an orphanage for 150 Armenian children.

PRAYER MEETING

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN

Topic, May 9–15. Why I Love Jesus. 1 John 4: 19; Jno. 3: 14–17.

To tell why we love a person is almost as hard as to analyze the bloom of a flower or to explain the secret of the tinted clouds of eventide. A great love possessing the heart and controlling the life bears one along in defiance of the cold processes of reasoning. All one can sometimes say is, "I love because I can't help it. I can as easily tell why I am as why I love." Nevertheless, it may serve to deepen our love for Jesus and to commend him to others if we try to set forth the grounds of our affection for him, even though it grates upon us a little to speak of a relation so personal and so dear.

To me the first reason for loving Christ has never been the one specified in the passage in 1 John to which reference is made. The mere fact that another loves us does not, of itself, beget a corresponding affection. Jesus' own loveliness is the primary ground of my affection for him. I see in him a being worthy of my utmost powers of loving. He realizes to me the ideal of manhood. I have known persons, and I have met them in books, who have fascinated me and have aroused and still hold my deepest affection, but Jesus in the full roundness of his character so far surpasses them that the language of the mystical hymn writers of the middle ages seems none too strong to take upon my lips:

Jesus, name all names above,
Jesus, best and dearest!
Jesus, fount of perfect love,
Holiest, tenderest, nearest.

Such a stanza as this expresses not merely a transient emotion, but a conviction which deepens as life goes on.

Add to this inherent loveliness of Jesus' character the fact that he loves me and it becomes impossible to do anything else but love him. Fairest as he is among men, unless I knew that he loved me the affection roused by the beauty of his character might, in time, languish. Now, however, I know, as every man who has trusted and tried to follow Jesus knows, that he has done what no other influence could accomplish for us. He has interpreted life's mysteries and problems. He has furnished help over the hard places. He has kindled again and again hope and courage when they were disappearing under the strain of the daily burden. He has opened a new world of thought and feeling. He has stood near when earthly comforts and satisfactions were powerless to console. Best of all, he has, we dare to hope, taken some of the selfishness, meanness and badness out of us, saved us from our worst selves, and made us more worthy to be called the sons of God.

Literature

BOOK REVIEWS

THE STORY OF THE PILGRIM FATHERS

Another important addition to the increasing literature relating to the Pilgrims is this volume, from the pen of Edward Arber, one of the most trustworthy of English historical experts. For many years he has made a specialty of editing ancient and historically significant works for republication, and has given some particular attention to Pilgrim history. He has done his work in the present instance with his usual zeal and general skill, and the value of his production is very great. His purpose has been to furnish an account of the origin and history of the Pilgrim movement from its inception down to 1623, scientific in character, yet popular and readable in form. The book includes copious extracts from early works, especially the Bradford manuscript, and Mourt's Relation and Winslow's Good News from New England are inserted bodily, the ancient spelling and punctuation, however, being discarded. The scholarly merit of the work is apparent at once, but it is less of a narrative and more a collection of facts and papers arranged in due order than we expected to find it.

In addition to the general value of such a record some of the features of this one deserve special mention. At the outset the author—in contrast to Mr. Edward Eggleston, his most recent predecessor on the theme—makes prominent the intense hostility to Roman Catholicism which was so notable a cause of Puritanism and of the Pilgrim undertaking. He also speaks with more severity than has been usual, even among those who hold the same opinions, but not too strongly, of the oppressive laws formerly enforced in England against Nonconformity. He describes graphically the history of the other English churches in Amsterdam, and impresses one afresh with the strong contrast between it and that of the harmonious, peaceful Pilgrim church. He goes carefully into details as to the voyage and the early colony, aiming to establish his statements point by point, and his tables, lists, etc., are very helpful.

Moreover, he has made several possible and one or two certain additions to the exact knowledge of the topic. He establishes a possibility, perhaps a probability, that the Scrooby church was not an outgrowth of that at Gainsborough, as commonly has been supposed, and that, instead of having been organized largely by persons left behind when the latter church emigrated to Holland, it was formed independently. He also claims that the two churches did not emigrate at an interval of some two years but at about the same time. Furthermore, he holds that the pastor of the Gainsborough church, John Smyth, was not the man of that name who matriculated at Christ's College, Cambridge, Nov. 26, 1571, as has been supposed, but he who took his M. A. degree there in 1593, and the Preacher of the city of Lincoln, 1603–5. As to both of these matters there is something to be said on each side. We incline to think that the evidence for the development of the Scrooby church from that at Gainsborough has been exaggerated, but that Mr. Arber's claims about the identity of Smyth and the date of the emigration of his church need more support. He also makes some additions to the list of books issued by the Pilgrim Press at Leyden; and he has unearthed, and here prints, a statement of the claims made in respect to the robbery of the ship Fortune by the French in February, 1622, a new and interesting document. In spite of certain defects, the book is the peer of the standards upon its theme.

Some of its errors are comparatively unimportant, yet should be corrected Such are the misprints—"1849" for "1619" and "1622" for "1620"—on pages 242 and 260, where the connection makes the sense clear, and the charge (p. 346) that the Leyden church was to blame for the oversparring of the Speedwell. There is no evidence that the "fitting" included anything more than supplying her with provisions, etc. It may have meant more or it may not. If it did, still there is no reason to regard the Pilgrims as greatly blameworthy, if, none of them being very familiar with shipping, they were deceived into supposing that the Speedwell's masts and yards were not too heavy. They were more unfortunate than culpable. The author's language is too strong. Moreover, instead of "buckling" (p. 349) referring to the repairing of the main beam, it means the very bending and cracking which was to be repaired.

Some other mistakes are more important. To go back to the source of the movement, Mr. Arber goes astray in asserting that the old Manor Place at Scrooby has absolutely disappeared and in quoting Canon Raine's statement, made in 1860. If he will visit the spot he will find at least two of the three longitudinal walls of the building to be evidently portions of the original, not to speak of minor features within as well as the arch and niche without. Nearly or quite half of the present structure is ancient.

Again, the author condemns Francis Johnson with tremendous severity and accuses members of the church of which Johnson was pastor with gross immorality. But, although his view may be correct, no sufficient evidence is offered here in support of these extreme charges, and without it his rejection of the cautious Governor Bradford's favorable testimony to the church is unwarranted. Johnson had grave faults and so did his church, but Mr. Arber in his charges seems to us to have gone beyond the warrant of his evidence cited. Another error is his inclusion of the Handmaid's passengers among the Pilgrim Fathers. They reached Plymouth in May, 1630. By that time the colony had become well established and these new arrivals had only hearsay knowledge of the experiences and trials of the original colonists. The accepted custom of including among the Pilgrim Fathers only those who came by the Mayflower in 1620, the Fortune in 1621, and the Anne and Little James in 1623, is not only based upon reason but is too firmly established to be altered. Moreover, all who came over in the Mayflower in 1620 and remained are customarily reckoned as Pilgrims, whether hired men, church members or not. To include Hatherley, who came over about 1635, because he was one of the London Merchants, is an error.

Furthermore, Mr. Arber calls the church in Plymouth "essentially a church of Laymen"; and adds, "in that respect, it anticipated the Quakers." But the Pilgrim church did not discard the regular ministry but lived from the outset in expectation of obtaining a pastor as soon as possible. Moreover, although it may be true that "as long as Governor BRADFORD lived; no Minister ever dared to aspire to lead them, as John Robinson had done at Amsterdam and Leyden," it is not true that they had no minister, except for a few years, and the conspicuous and affectionately recognized superiority of Robinson, rather than any reluctance on the part of either pastors or people, was the reason why nobody aspired to lead as he had led. Once more Mr. Arber is mistaken in declaring that the church "within the limits of the Old Colony was a National Church; for it embraced the whole community." It did not. There was no other church, and organized dissent was prohibited, mainly if not wholly, for the supposed sake of public safety. But there was no attempt to include everybody in the church. Even voters were not necessarily church members.

Mr. Arber does not mention Mr. J. A. Goodwin's book, The Pilgrim Republic, or Dr. John Brown's The Pilgrim Fathers of New England. He has added some facts to those narrated by these and other writers, but has not shaped—perhaps has not cared to shape—his material into so readable a story as he might have made. He has written for students rather than for the public at large. His book is a treasury of information and the fact that it contains reprints of several important early works, two or three of which we have mentioned, adds largely to its value. All in all it deserves warm commendation. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $2.00]

RELIGIOUS

The Trial and Death of Jesus Christ [American Tract Society. $2 00] is, in a new edition, a devotional history of our Lord's passion by Rev. Dr. James Stalker. It is exactly what it purports to be. It is a history, carefully studied and elaborately narrated, yet without undue or superfluous fullness. It is also a devotional story. That is to say, the author has been dominated throughout by the purpose to describe the successive scenes of our Lord's passion so as to bring out and enforce their inner and spiritual meaning, and to do this in a thoughtful and practical manner. Care has been taken to avoid anything like sensationalism, and the work is reverent and uplifting throughout. It will do good to the reader and at the same time add to the author's already wide and well-deserved reputation as a student of sacred subjects. It is handsomely printed and illustrated.——Inspiration Considered as a Trend [American Baptist Pub. Society. $1 00] is by Rev. D. W. Faunce, D. D. It enforces the theory that the inspiration of the Bible is to be inferred quite as conclusively from the general trend in the various theories of its inspiration and in the impressions made by the Bible itself as a whole as in any other manner. The term "trend" is doubtless sufficiently well understood to make his meaning plain, and he has contended with earnestness and devoutness, as well as with considerable learning, for the sound position that the general impression made by the Bible as to its being inspired by the Almighty is convincing. There are many minds for which this argument has more weight than any other.

Contemporary Theology and Theism [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1 25], by Prof. R. M. Wenley, contains a course of lectures delivered by him before Glasgow University and partially republished in The Thinker. It has been greatly enlarged and elaborated for publication in volume form. In the introductory chapter the author points out the differences between what may be called the objective and the subjective schools of theology, represented by such men as Biedermann, Keim, Weizsäcker and Otto Pfleiderer on the one hand, and Dorner, Beischlag and perhaps Bernhard Weiss on the other, and indicates that this division is essentially paralleled both in England and the United States. Then he states the general principles and conclusions, first of the speculative school and then of the Ritschlian school, making criticisms on the main teachings of each, and passing to consider in several chapters the theistic philosophy and closing with a chapter on the final idealism. The work is too philosophically technical in language for any but well-trained readers, but these will appreciate the author's skill in analysis and discrimination and will follow his course of thought with profit, even though some of his conclusions seem open to question. He is well read in the literature of his subject, and the volume answers well the purpose expressed in the preface, that of leading students to frame opinions of their own.

STORIES

Chun Ti-Kung [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25], by C. A. Rees, is an unusual book. It supplies, we presume, a not inaccurate picture of some phases of Chinese life. It describes the education of a young Chinaman who rose to an official position and became interpreter to the Chinese embassy in England. There he fell in love with and married a young English girl, in spite of the fact—to the Chinese mind a minor matter—that he already had a wife and child in China, the English maiden being quite unaware of this important fact. Her experiences on reaching China, even before the revelation of her position as only the second wife, and the sad outcome of the story render it anything but enlivening. If such marriages were likely to become common there would be therein a justification for the book, but they can hardly be very numerous at present. Nevertheless, the story has literary merit, although crude in some passages, and as a study of Chinese manners and ideas it deserves to be read.

Ziska [Stone & Kimball], by Marie Corelli, has for a sub-title The Problem of a Wicked Soul. It is in the later vein of this well-known author, we regret to say, and that is a somewhat degenerate vein. The theme of the book is the cruelty of man to woman, but inasmuch as the man and woman lived some thousands of years ago, and are now reincarnated, the sympathy of the reader for the woman in taking a dire revenge upon the man, albeit he is not much of a man, is not easily sustained. The book is written in the superlative degree, and the eyes of the heroine are only equaled by the recklessness of the hero. It is too realistic for our taste in many ways, and one seems to hear the gurgle of rage against men in the author's throat as he reads her hysterical pages. If it be true that Marie Corelli is still Queen Victoria's favorite author, we venture to suggest that her Gracious Majesty celebrate the sixtieth year of her reign by changing her favorite. ——A Pearl of the Realm [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25], by Anna L. Glynn, is a sweet and wholesome story about the civil wars in England, full of incident and adventure, picturing vividly the differences which occurred sometimes in families on account of politics, and is throughout a strongly drawn and brightly colored picture of the period.

MISCELLANEOUS

Prof. J. M Hoppin's Greek Art on Greek Soil [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $2.00] is a remarkably skillful and effective blending of reminiscences of travel with criticism and instruction upon Greek art. The author has made two visits to Greece, with a considerable interval between them, and the changes apparent to him upon revisiting the country suggest enjoyable reminiscenses and reflections and lead him on to graphic and pleasant pictures of the Greeks and their life today. The main purpose of the book, however, is to comment upon the art and the architecture of Greece, and Professor Hoppin shows himself again to be an accomplished student and a discriminating and stimulating critic. His book is extremely interesting and one is led along, so to speak, from temple to temple and from statue to statue, enlarging constantly his knowledge without quite realizing how much he is enjoying at the same time until something causes him to pause and consider. The book appears at a fortunate time, when public attention is closely fixed upon Greece, and it will find ready readers. The illustrations are not numerous but are superior in quality.

In his Southern Statesmen of the Old Régime [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $2.00] Prof. W. P. Trent has put together lectures on Washington, Jefferson. Randolph, Calhoun, Stephens, Tombs and Jefferson Davis. They are spirited pictures of these men, their characters and doings. Each lecture is preceded by the portrait of its subject. The proper comment to be made upon the work is that the author regards his subject more from the Southern than from the Northern point of view, choosing the former in the belief that only thus can justice be done. We have no quarrel with him on this score, but we doubt if his argument, not in justification but in explanation of the course followed by Stephens, Tombs and Davis, for example, in regard to secession, will prove generally convincing. Nevertheless, it is but fair to these men that it should be made, and one can see how much weight the reasoning which he attributes to them may have had with their minds. But, although it is an excuse, it is hardly likely to be deemed sufficient. No one is disposed at this late day to regard any of them, even Davis, with bitter hostility, but Professor Trent gives a more favorable interpretation of the circumstances and conditions than is likely to be finally accepted. Nevertheless, his book, probably all the more on this account, is a valuable addition to the biography and history of the closing century. His style is animated and his lectures are eminently readable.

APRIL MAGAZINES

The April Harper's [$4.00] contains several important papers felicitously different in character. One is Washington and the French Craze of '93, by Prof. J. B. MacMasters, another is Dr. H. S. Williams's Paleontological Progress of the Century, another is Clare De Graffenried's From Home to Throne in Belgium, and another is Our Trade with South America, with special reference to Brazil and the River Plate Republics, by Lieut. Richard Mitchell, U. S. N. The late Mr. Du Maurier's novel, The Martians, Mr. C. F. Lummis's The Awakening of the Nation, and Mr. Poulteney Bigelow's White Man's Africa are continued agreeably, Mr. Lummis dealing with the career of President Diaz and Mr. Bigelow with the Cape of Good Hope region. The latter is particularly timely just now. Several pleasant short stories and poems complete the number. The illustrations, as usual, are of a high order.

The Planting of Princeton College is the theme of the opening paper of the Presbyterian and Reformed Review [$3.00] and is by Prof. John DeWitt. Pres. D. W. Fisher discusses Socialism in Italy, Prof. T. G. Darling deals with the Problem of Public Worship, Prof. Chalmers Martin has a second paper on Apostolic and Modern Missions, the subject of which is the present problem. Rev. W. H. Hodge explains the Biblical usage of "soul" and "spirit." Morals before Moses is the subject of Professor Osgood, and Efficient Preaching that of Rev. Dr. R. F. Sample. Professor DeWitt's paper is exceptionally important and valuable and the usual high quality of the review is well sustained throughout. The department of recent theological literature is conspicuously able, as always.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley, M. P., in the Nineteenth Century [$4.50], has an article on The Boer Indictment and the British Policy, the Duke of Argyle has one entitled Mr. Herbert Spencer and Lord Salisbury on Evolution, and Sir Wemyss Reid and Dr. Guinness Rogers discuss the Integrity of the Ottoman Empire as a Diplomatic Formula. These are the papers to which most readers will turn first. But Mr. Charles Whateley on the Encroachment of Women; How Poor Ladies Live, by Miss Eliza Orme, and How Poor Ladies Might Live, by Miss Edith M. Shaw; together with Some Changes in Social Life During the Queen's Reign, by Rt. Hon. Lord Algernon West, as well as Mr. Laurier and Manitoba, by Mr. J. G. S. Cox, also are well worth reading. There are several other more or less interesting papers. The timeliness of the contributions on current subjects is fairly equaled by the interest of the remainder.

No student of political and social science can fail to value the Quarterly Journal of Economics. Mr. C. F. Dunbar in his article, The Safety of the Legal Tender Paper, argues with conclusive force that a Government currency under our conditions is an unfit subject for national legislation. Nothing else, important as some other issues are at present, is equally vital to our national welfare with the proposed reform of the currency. Mr. Edward Cummings supplies an instructive study of Co-operative Stores in the United States, affirming the co-operative store movement here to bear all the marks of the unmistakably premature. Mr. C. M. Walsh points out the evils of the steadily appreciating standard of values in opposition to the theory of Prof. J. B. Clark. Mr. C. S. Griffin also discusses the taxation of sugar in this country.

The New England Historical and Genealogical Register has portraits of Charles S. Dawes and William P. Kuhn, and a large amount of the usual interesting and permanently valuable miscellaneous and genealogical material. There is a facsimile of the will of Alexander Selkirk, and another page contains the Vassall genealogy and arms.

The Art Journal blends intelligent and edifying matter with charmingly conceived and finely executed illustrations, and stands as always in the foremost rank of publications relating to art. Some of the topics which are treated this month are the Collection of Pictures at Longford Castle, the Wallace Bequest to the Nation, and the Bowes Museum in Barnard Castle.

The International Studio [John Lane. $3.50] is a new illustrated monthly, edited by Charles Holme. It illustrates editorial skill and experience most successfully applied. The illustrative work is diversified, some of it very striking, all of it of the highest quality. Hans Thoma and His Work, a paper by H. W. Singer, opens this number. Some portraits of artists, painted by themselves at the National Portrait Gallery in London, are reproduced, among them those of Hogarth, Reynolds, Opie, Romney, Wilkie and D. G. Rossetti. The other topics are Mural Decoration in Scotland, Mrs. W. Chance's Studies of Cats, Some Recent Book-Plates, mostly pictorial, and the Decorative Art Movement in Paris. The department of Studio Talk will be appreciated by artists, and the reviews of recent publications are well done. We cordially commend the publication.

Poet Lore [Poet Lore Co. $2.50] opens with a poem, The Saving of Judas, by Hannah P. Kimball, a dramatic interpretation of the possible mental experience of the apostate. The remainder of the contents consists largely of prose. It has some specially noteworthy material, such as a Leaf from an Unpublished Volume, which is a short unpublished romance by Charlotte Brontë, supplied by W. G. Kingsland, and An Excelente Ballade of Charitie, alleged to have been written by Thomas Rowley in 1464, but apparently really the work of the famous Chatterton. J. W. Bray discusses Shakespeare the Critic, and T. P. Sawin compares Browning's Childe Roland with Tennyson's Vision of Sin. The department of reviews and that of notes and news are exceedingly interesting. And all in all the magazine takes easily a high place among characteristically literary productions.

The Biblical World deals with Biblical criticism and kindred subjects in its usual practical and instructive manner. The article on Textbook Literature of the Babylonians, by Prof. Maurice Jastro, Jr., makes an important addition to general knowledge on the subject.

Mr. John J. Loud of Weymouth, an experienced chorus leader, has prepared both the tune and the words of three patriotic songs suitable for wide use. They are entitled The Commonwealth of Massachusetts, The Pilgrim and the Puritan, and The Revolution of 1776. The music, simple yet spirited, is the same for all, while the words, varied to accord with the thought of the three distinctive titles, are calculated to stir the heart. Already schools, church choirs and musical organizations are making use of these productions which, printed on separate pages, can be obtained of the author at a small cost. Much satisfaction with them has been expressed by those who have seen how popular they quickly become even among children and young people.

NOTES

—— Capt. A. T. Mahan's Life of Nelson has been received with the greatest favor in England.

—— Rev. Dr. C. E. Stevens's work, Sources of the Constitution of the United States, is being translated in French by a member of the French diplomatic service.

—— Yale University has received from the estate of the late Thomas C. Sloane $160,000 and is to get $30,000 more, and the money will be used for the needs of the library.

—— A new subscription edition of Trumbull's well-known History of Connecticut is proposed. It was issued last in 1818 and has been for nearly a century the standard history of the State up to the time of its composition.

—— A copy of the first edition of Walton's The Compleat Angler recently brought $2,075 in London, not only a high price in itself but also $1,200 more than it was sold for ten years ago. Money thus spent is not always invested unwisely.

—— A personal account of occurrences in Johannesburg at the time of the Jameson raid has been written by Mrs. J. Hays Hammond, wife of the American engineer so often mentioned in connection with the matter. It is soon to appear simultaneously here and in England.

—— Copies of the first edition of the volume about Queen Victoria, by Mr. Holmes, chief librarian at Windsor Castle, will not be out for some time yet. But such is the demand that the whole of the edition de luxe has been subscribed for, and the vouchers have been sold and resold at increasing prices until they have reached $150 apiece, more than four times the original price of the work.

FOUR CENTURIES IN ONE EVENING

The Congregational Club of Boston set for itself an extensive task last Monday evening. The subject selected was Four Protestant Centuries and What They Have Taught Us. A Bird's-eye View of the Progress of the Church from Melancthon to the Present Time. As subdivided, Dr. Judson Smith spoke on The Sixteenth Century—First Fruits of the Reformation; Dr. A. E. Dunning on The Seventeenth Century—The Puritans and Their Surroundings; Rev. C. L. Noyes on The Eighteenth Century—The Storm and Stress Period; and Rev. DeWitt S. Clark, D.D., on The Nineteenth Century—Progressive Thought and Activity in the Church.

Each speaker was given twenty minutes. The large range of the topics and the amount of knowledge required in the hearers, in order that they might appreciate the treatment of so great movements in so short a time, might naturally have deterred some of the members from attempting to follow the speakers, but the large attendance, close attention, frequent and hearty applause evidenced a deep interest and hearty enjoyment of the addresses. It seemed to be the general opinion that the meeting was one of the most successful in the history of the club. The increasing number of ladies in the galleries of the Meionaon shows that the wives of many of the members are glad to take advantage of the invitation extended to them to come in and listen to the intellectual exercises, which, after the supper, the club is willing to share with its better portion.

Next month, however, May 24, will be ladies' night. The meeting will be held in Tremont Temple, and will be enlivened by twelve five-minute speeches, all by members of the club.

Secretary Hazen announced the following summaries of the forthcoming Year-Book: Whole number churches, 5,482; added, 176; gain, 65; church members, 615,121; gain, 12,564; additions, 54,633; on confession, 32,137; Sunday school members, 687,396; gain, 4,816; benevolent contributions, $2,129,456; decrease, $57,594; home expenditures, $6,871,128; increase, $163,515.

LET OUR HYMNS STIR OUR CONSCIENCE

Prof. George Adam Smith recently said a true word about modern hymnody as contrasted with the Psalms:

> They provided a mirror for magistrates, stirred the heart of the citizen with a passion for the commonweal, and lifted before the eyes of the people ideals of social service and righteousness and mercy. The defect of modern hymnody is that it fails to strike the national note. Hymnody sometimes helps us to feel that we are sinners and other times that we are saints, but hardly ever that we are citizens! It does its duty in awakening the imagination to the heathen abroad, but rarely draws out our sympathy for the heathen at home! It tells of "Afric's sunny fountains" and "India's coral strand," but do you know a single hymn which will give you a picture that will stir your conscience of any slum or unholy street in London, Glasgow or Edinburgh?

In and Around Boston

"Old Boston Days and Ways"

For the worthy purposes of the Boston Teachers' Mutual Benefit Association, nearly every one of Puritan stock and feeling was interested in last week's "historical festival" held in Music Hall from April 22–30. It was under the admirable management of Miss Eager of New York and the executive committee of the association, headed by the president, Granville B. Putnam. There were seven evening entertainments, a Saturday matinée and four short children's matinées, in which well-known people represented, in tableaux and in spirited acting and dialogue, more than twenty-five important scenes illustrating Boston's share in the great events of our colonial, Revolutionary and early national history. These scenes were rendered under the auspices of such organizations as the Old South Historical Society, the Boston Art Students, the Tavern Club, the Colonial Dames, the Daughters of the Revolution, the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, Battery A, and the Boston Masters, while most of the children's scenes were undertaken by pupils of some of the public schools.

The festival has been a series of charming entertainments, with music and dancing and merriment mingled with beautiful tableaux-vivants and pieces of play-acting seriously representing how New England was begun, how the first Bostonians used to live and the Indian before them, and how many a "glorious day was fought and won." The extended research which Miss Eager devotes to the planning of these entertainments, which gives them their educational value, is already well known from the festivals held in Plymouth last year and in Medford during the past winter; but much praise is also due to her executive ability in rehearsing and stage-managing, even under such difficulties as Music Hall presents, with no ante-rooms and no wings for the scenery. A charming scene, with a May dance, was laid in Boston, England, with a view of St. Botolph's Church, whose bells "rang the Brides of Enderbie" in Jean Ingelow's poem. Others of Old England were in Cambridge when "the action" was carried, which really established the Massachusetts Bay Colony and the departure of "the great emigration" from Southampton. An especially good scene laid in Boston was a town-meeting, in which it was voted to open a school in the year-old colony.

Other Reminders of Colonial Days

The Massachusetts Daughters of the Revolution held a memorable exhibition last week at Copley Hall—the largest and altogether the most interesting collection of colonial and Revolutionary treasures ever brought together in New England. There were between two and three thousand articles, so well selected out of the offerings of twice as many that there were few duplicates and almost nothing displayed merely because it was old. Mrs. Charles Francis Withington was chairman of the general committee.

The object of the exhibition was to raise money to mark historic places and in every way possible to extend interest and knowledge in the early history of our country. As one means to this end the committee gave three hundred tickets to the American history classes in the public schools to be distributed as prizes to the three children of every class who had done the best work in tho past month. Besides that, all public school children were admitted at half the price for children's admission. The most interesting sights of all in this beautiful show were the "prize" children, often accompanied by admiring classmates, listening eagerly to all that the ladies could tell them of the objects which gave life and reality to people and the events of their history study.

As the exhibition was held on Patriot's Day and the two following days, it seemed most fitting that the center of interest should be in a case, shown under calcium light, of a dozen or more beautiful pieces of old table silver, made by that excellent Boston silversmith of his day, the patriot, Paul Revere. There were other pieces of old silver, interesting for their beauty, their oddity, as well as for the honored hands that have used them and the patriotic dames who have owned them. The interest in making this collection as valuable as possible unearthed many relics hitherto unknown, and among them several Revolutionary rolls not recorded at the State House. The catalogue is a book of permanent value.

Organ Recitals a Great Success

The public organ recitals under the auspices of the Twentieth Century Club came to a close with a particularly brilliant recital by Mr. H. C. Macdougall in the Harvard Congregational Church, Brookline, last Saturday afternoon. The instrument in this church is in certain respects unique among the organs of Boston and vicinity, being the only one provided with a movable keyboard, and the only one having an "echo organ" at a considerable distance from the body of the instrument. The recital afforded an exceptional opportunity for hearing this modern organ at its best, and a very large and appreciative audience took advantage of it. On the afternoon's program appeared some interesting statistics regarding the entire series of twenty-two recitals.

The total attendance at twenty-one recitals was approximately 21,700, making the average a little over 1,000. There have been performed, in all, 138 organ numbers, representing fifty-seven composers. Eleven works have been twice played, and one—Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor—has been given three times. The committee would have welcomed even more general repetition of important standard compositions. At eleven recitals seventeen singers have assisted. Four works for the organ with another instrument have been given, one of them twice. In all twenty-one organists have assisted in the series, freely giving their services. The church authorities, too, have granted the use of their auditoriums and organs. Already there is talk about a future series of recitals, and music lovers are gratefully expressing their indebtedness to the Twentieth Century Club for placing such privileges within the reach of the Boston public.

Theology of the Coming Century

Rev. E. L. House played the part of a prophet last Monday morning when he presented to the Boston ministers a paper predicting future developments in theology. He declared that with the theology of Christian defense we are entering on a new era. Our skeptical opponents will not make the same gross attacks as in the past. Science, though it has made many mistakes, has done much in sounding the channel of Christianity, analyzing the stream and in tearing off from the church creeds many barnacles that retarded progress. In the coming century, also, thinking will be less dogmatic and more tolerant. Another change of the future will be the development of questions of a social nature. The church will give life, light and help to the whole man. It will make an honest effort to bring about a Christian environment in the business world. The speaker closed with the earnest assertion that, whatever the coming changes and upheavals may be, Christ's position as Son of God, Saviour and Redeemer of all mankind is secure for all time.

"Long Live Old Wheaton"

Saturday, April 24, was a notable day in the annals of the New England Wheaton Seminary Club. Trustees, alumnæ, pupils and guests, nearly 200 in number, assembled in beautifully decorated parlors at the Vendome for a reception and breakfast in honor of Miss A. E. Stanton, the retiring principal of the seminary, and Rev. S. V. Cole, president elect. Few institutions of learning in New England can show a nobler record than this famous old school at Norton, fragrant with the memory of Lucy Larcom and other eminent graduates, and fresh interest in its future is awakened at present by the innovation of placing a man at its head. After a sumptuous repast Miss Annie M. Kilham, president of the club, gracefully welcomed the guests, among whom was Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, who made an earnest plea for Greece. Dr. A. H. Plumb, president of the board of trustees, in a brief but singularly happy address, laid emphasis upon the fact that the religious motive had ever been supreme at Norton, and therein lay the secret of the strength of character manifest in its hundreds of graduates. He then introduced Mr. Cole, who outlined no new policy but frankly declared that for a while he should follow the old trail, only making such improvements in the way of new buildings and similar equipments as the times demand. This school, like others of its class, faces the difficult question of whether it is best to aspire to the rank of a college, but no move will be made in that direction for the present.

Affectionate tribute was paid to Mrs. Wheaton, the generous benefactor of the seminary, now in her eighty-eighth year, by Mrs. Jeannie W. Lincoln, who, with Miss Kilham, has lately been appointed a trustee—another token of progress—and Miss Stanton spoke in hearty appreciation of the efficiency of the board. Addresses were also made by Miss Julia Osgood and Mrs. Estelle Merrill, each of whom has achieved distinction as a writer and a lecturer, and by Mrs. Kate Upson Clark, president from the beginning of the New York Wheaton Club. Mrs. Clark's originality and wit are the delight of her audiences, but the despair of her reporters. Laughter and applause frequently punctuated her remarks, which were full of wisdom as well as fun. Culture without character she affirmed to be failure, and stoutly declared that she would rather see her three boys milksops and fools than bad men. Earnest, forceful words from Alice Freeman Palmer and Frank A. Hill and some choice music, including the song, "Long live old Wheaton," rounded out a program of more than ordinary interest to all who care for the education of girls.

The Range of Human Interest

What a city Boston is for agitation and discussion of schemes designed to ameliorate humanity! Take the record of a single day, for example. On a recent Wednesday there were in various parts of the city meetings and lectures participated in by men and women high in social and educational circles, and these are some of the problems over which they knitted their brows: civil service reform, the establishment of a reformed theater and a temperance club house, sociology in the practical aspects, the work and possibilities of the day nursery, the public schools, the work of the W. C. T. U., social ideals in books.

Members of the Social Science and Municipal Departments of the Twentieth Century Club, under the leadership of Mr. Robert A. Woods of the South End House, are about to begin a thorough study of the local tenement house problem, and the light which past local and foreign experiments shed on the amelioration of the evils which are known or found to exist. The members are called upon to select a special aspect of the problem which they care to study, and to serve on sub-committees to investigate those lines.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS

Special sermons on giving have accomplished large results in many instances. The spirit of benevolence should be cultivated by the pastor, as in a Maine church. Suppose, as in that case, the entire resident membership of the majority of our churches had pledged definite sums to our missionary work. We would hear little of debts then.

We congratulate that Nebraska church which is to exchange a supply from another denomination, however eloquent, for a resident pastor of its own persuasion. It reminds us of the testimony of the young man who married after playing the butterfly for some years: "There's nothing like settling down to one stiddy girl."

A novel idea for securing the attendance of children at preaching services comes from a speaker at a Western association, who suggested that the pastor, beside preparing a part of the sermon or service specially for the children, visit them in their day school to familiarize himself with their secular life and work.

Our New Jersey brethren are well to the front as regards their sentiments of Christian unity, and they reiterate this year at their annual gathering their desire to promote the cause as far as practicable Their message to the National Council's committee is reasonable and progressive.

A beautiful Easter custom, and one which is rapidly gaining in favor, is the reception of new members on that day. What Easter offering is more welcome to the risen Saviour than consecrated lives?

Increasing benevolences in several St. Louis churches would seem to indicate that either the long expected "era of prosperity," or an even more desirable era of consecration, had arrived.

Missionary debts and lack of missionary interest would both be wiped out if the C. E. Societies of our land could muster such enthusiasm as a Boston society shows.

A new church in which, like the one in Minnesota, all the charter members unite on confession ought speedily to leaven the community.

What an ally the churches of a large New England city have had in the local Y. M. C. A.!

Laborers in Salem, Mass., have recognized a friendship in the local churches.

Of Special Note

The appointment of committees in the Interior to increase interest in missions.

A Connecticut plan for reaching strangers on Sunday.

Large debts paid in several important instances.

An enviable record by a young church in Ohio.

Vigorous S. S. work in New Jersey.

Magnificent gifts in Chicago.

Stirring work in Detroit.

THE NEW JERSEY STATE MEETING

The annual meeting held with the Central Church, Philadelphia, last week was notable rather for the high grade of its discussions than for any other single feature. The spiritual note was struck strongly at the beginning in the address of the retiring moderator, Rev. C. A. Savage, on The Beggar at the Temple Gate. It is the mission of the church, he declared, to minister to human need, to give to men; but to give life far more than alms, and, above all, to give by personal service. The fostering of spiritual life in the believer's own breast, a daily discipline, with a large ideal always in view, was set forth by Dr. S. M. Newman in a paper full of insight and suggestion. This was happily followed in the evening by Dr. H. A. Stimson's sermon from John 1: 12, in which the possibility and privilege of continual consciousness of divine indwelling were emphasized.

The demands, problems and needs of the intellect were presented chiefly by Dr. J. M. Whiton in a remarkably cogent and luminous paper on Religion and Modern Knowledge. The friction between these two, he pointed out, has come from the lack of coherency between men's ideas of God, which change with difficulty, and their ideas of God's works—that is, their science—which are constantly changing; and peace of heart, he showed, is by no means to be found in stalwart insistence upon dogmas which new truth is displacing, but rather in a larger faith in God—a faith eminently warranted by the historic progress of religion in the face of all the dogmatic changes of the past.

Most prominent, however, were the practical themes, such as Evangelism, one phase of which was treated by Prof. L. B. Moore of Howard University in a carefully prepared paper on Young Men in Our Cities. He was followed by Rev. J. L. Wells, who gave a graphic and inspiring account of work among young men as carried on in Jersey City. His Sunday school class, which a few years ago enrolled some fifteen young men, has received since then over 160 accessions from the People's Palace. In missions the needs of the home field were presented by Sec J. B. Clark, and also, with new facts and from a new point of view, by Miss M. D. Moffatt of New York. Miss A. H Bradshaw of Sendai, Japan, and Rev. H. S. Bliss represented the foreign field, and Secretaries Cobb and Boynton spoke with their wonted point and force. Rev. N. H. Whittlesey presented the cause of ministerial relief. New methods in the Sunday school were described by Rev. D. E. Marvin of Germantown, Philadelphia, whose church is seeking to make its school a carefully organized training department for the whole congregation, from the infant in the cradle to the adult church-goer; and Christian Principle in Public Life was treated by Drs. C. H. Everest and A. H. Bradford. The latter insisted that the same ethical standard is to be applied to the nation as to the individual. He also boldly claimed that, by virtue of their training and their independent political position, ministers are the truest exponents and expounders of a nation's moral ideas.

In a symposium on Christian Unity Dr. W. H. Ward made a strong plea for "the New Jersey basis of union," to which a cordial response was made by Pres. J. B Weston of the Christian Connection, who, while opposing any church union that meant putting three sects in the place of two, believed that union between allied Christian bodies is coming, and also that certain steps toward it in the line of comity are already practicable. The symposium was concluded by a fraternal but not optimistic address by Dr. Philputt of the Disciples, who feared external unity was an "iridescent dream" even while he admitted that nothing short of it would fulfill our Lord's Prayer. The association then instructed its committee to prepare a memorial to the National Council's Committee on Christian Unity, "asking it to take such action as will bring to the attention of the Protestant Christian churches of America the subject of a general federation for co-operation in such work as they have in common, and to express their unity as Christians."

Other items of business were the voting of a memorial to the United States Senate in support of the arbitration treaty, the passing of a strongly worded memorial in honor of Dr. Marcus Whitman, the appointment of delegates to the National Temperance Convention at Saratoga next August, and the admission to membership of three new churches. The association has increased during the year in church members 516, about one-half of whom were received on confession. It has also made a gain in benevolent contributions of about $3,000. W. F C.

Two Massachusetts Installations

An Eastern Outpost

If ever joy and sorrow were expressed in turn by the termination of one pastorate and the beginning of another, it was over the exchange of pastoral relations by Rev. A. W. Archibald, D. D, formerly of Hyde Park, Mass., now of Brockton. Unanimity for and against the change was strongly manifested by the respective parishes thus thrown face to face with each other. In Hyde Park a lood of letters, a petition signed by 170 of he young people and other expressions could ot avail, however, against the unity of feeling and the greater opportunity in Brockton.

REV. A W. ARCHIBALD, D D.

The new church, the Porter Evangelical, lies n a live, growing city of 35,000 population, nd has a membership of over 600, the largest of the Congregational order in the city. Its organizations are strong and active, the Sunday chool averaging over 500 in its attendance nd the C. E. Society numbering its members n the hundreds. Moreover, the church has been a giving organization, as its large benevolences of past years show. The former pastor, Rev. F. A. Warfield, is now settled with he First Church, Omaha, Neb., where he was called last year.

Dr. Archibald's pastorate in Hyde Park for over four years has been unusually prosperous, the membership of the church increasing by a third to over 700. The annual total receipts have averaged $13,600, a debt of $2,000 has been raised, repairs on the edifice have cost $1,000, and pledges toward the lot for a new house have aggregated $12,000.

The pastor is a native of New Kingston, N. Y., where he was born in 1851. Graduating at Union College, he taught a year before entering Yale Divinity School, and on his graduation there went at once to Iowa. Among his former pastorates have been those with the First Church, Ottumwa, and Edwards Church, Davenport. He also served during his western residence as president of the Iowa H. M. S., State examiner of Chicago Seminary and trustee of Iowa College. Dr. Archibald was installed in his new charge April 22. His statement of belief was strongly conservative, and great satisfaction with it and its author was expressed by many members of the council. Large audiences assembled both in the afternoon and in the evening and the installation services were deeply interesting. The sermon was delivered by Rev. Dr. P. S. Moxom.

It carries one back to apostolic times to record instances of home missionary pastors having to labor with their own hands to support their families. It seems to us a grave question whether such use of the time and energy of trained leaders is true economy.

A Boston Suburb

Franklin Street Church, the oldest in Somerville, is rejoicing that, after being without a settled pastor for more than four years, a new period is now begun under the lead of Rev. R. W. Wallace, who has been pastor of United Church, Newport, R. I., since 1893. The installation exercises occurred April 20, the council meeting in the afternoon and appropriate exercises taking place in the evening. The spacious auditorium was beautified by the Easter decorations of the preceding Sunday, and after the collation a large congregation enjoyed a program of unusual excellence. Addresses were given by Rev. C. L. Noyes and Rev. E. S. Tead of neighboring sister churches on the topics, The Relation of the Church to the Community and to the Pastor, and by Hon. J. M. W. Hall and Rev. Orville Coats of a local Baptist church on The Relation of the Community to the Church and The Relation of the Church to the Young People. Other brief addresses on The Pastor's Privilege and Responsibility and The Supreme Aim of Church and Pastor were given by Rev. A B. Patten and Dr. W. H. Davis.

Before the call was given Mr. Wallace the church had several opportunities of hearing him as a supply in its own pulpit, and he had met personally many members of the congregation. The action of the church was unanimous. He is an able preacher, whose educational advantages have been liberal. He graduated from McGill University in 1872, and thereafter had five years of post graduate study. His former pastorates have been in London, Ont., Detroit and Wakefield, Mass. He is of Scotch-English descent. To the influence of two men Mr. Wallace credits his interest in Christian truth and the ministry—Sir William Dawson, in whose Bible class he was as a student, and the late Rev. George H. Wells, who encouraged his ambitions as a preacher. Church building has been a successful feature of several of the former pastorates of Mr. Wallace, and a number of periods of marked revival have occurred during his ministry.

REV R. W WALLACE

THE FLORIDA ASSOCIATION

This State body held its fourteenth annual session in Daytona, April 13-15. Mr. H. S. Chubb was moderator and Rev. Mason Noble scribe. The first evening the sermon was preached by Rev. E. W. Butler and the address of welcome and responses followed.

The registrar's report showed gratifying gains during the year—a net increase of five churches, sixty-nine members, four ministers and some advance in Sunday schools, Endeavor Societies and benevolences. Earnest and inspiring discussion followed the reports. The Woman's Home Missionary Society held its session in the afternoon, and the Florida H. M. S. in the evening. Many Cuban refugees are flocking into the State and scattering along the Western coast. At Tampa and Ybor City much mission work is being done among them with encouraging success, particularly among the children.

Thursday morning The Care of the Young People was the subject of an animated and suggestive discussion. A paper was read upon Dr. Gladden's Church Union, and a resolution of sympathy with Cuba was unanimously passed by a rising vote. The work and needs of the American Board were presented in the afternoon by Rev. E. P. Herrick, and following the American Missionary Association was considered by Rev. T. S. Perry, the Sunday School Society by Rev. William Shaw, and the Church Building Society by Rev. Mason Noble. The communion sermon was preached by Rev. James Bolton.

An inspiring praise service and discussion of Christian education were the features of the evening. Rev. G. M. Ward, president of Rollins College, presented the claims of that institution as the child of the association. Within a year the college has reduced expenses, adopted the "group system" of study, received four new instructors to the faculty and nearly trebled the number of students. Rev. F. M Sprague addressed the association eloquently and forcibly on The Crisis in Education, pleading powerfully for Christian education in preference to purely secular education. Rev. S. D. Paine spoke of the progress, general and local, of late years.

A painful duty was laid upon the association by the serious reports in circulation against the character and conduct of Rev. Asbury Caldwell, late pastor at West Palm Beach. A minute was passed suspending him from privileges of membership and a committee appointed to investigate his case.

The Daytona church was organized 1870, the first of our faith in the State. Now there are seventy-five churches. The beautiful edifice here is now crowded all winter.

Daytona is a beautiful town of tropical aspect, cool with shade of oak, pine and palmetto, and apparently less affected by the hard times than most other places in northern and central Florida. Its hospitality was ample and genial, the weather was delightful, and the meeting just closed was one to be most pleasantly remembered. T. S. P.

CELEBRATION AND DEDICATION

The church in Atkinson, N.H., celebrated its 125th anniversary on Good Friday by the dedication of a chapel. The act of dedication by the pastor, Rev. G. H. Scott, and his people, and Dr. J. D. Kingsbury's consecration hymn were specially impressive, and all the exercises were of a high order, including the short speeches from guests, which followed an informal reception to the pastor and his wife. The exercises were well attended and proved helpful. The pastor preached the sermon and Dr. Kingsbury offered the prayer. Special music was a pleasing addition to the service. The chapel is added on the side of the meeting house, both audience-rooms and the ladies' parlor opening together by sliding doors, while all rooms, including the kitchen and dining hall upstairs, are reached directly from the chapel entrance hall. A large number of the articles of furniture are gifts from friends. The cost of the building was $2,100.

NEW ENGLAND

Boston

[For other Boston news see page 617.]

Sunday was a day of an unusual number of exchanges, the pastors evidently desiring to avail themselves of a little rest after the strain of the services connected with Lent and Easter. Drs. Gordon and Reuen Thomas, and Drs. Hamilton and Beale exchanged pulpits in the morning; Rev. D. W. Waldron presented the cause of the City Missionary Society at Mt. Vernon Church, Dr. Plumb preached morning and evening at the Park Street Church and Dr. Webb supplied his pulpit; at Central Church the Easter music was repeated; at the Old South in the evening the Hampton Institute speakers and singers were heard; Rev. A. A. Berle, D. D., preached a strong sermon condemning the inertia of the Christian Powers as respects the Eastern situation.

Massachusetts

CAMBRIDGE.—North Avenue. At a special meeting the society voted last week to call Rev. L. M. Colfelt as pastor. He is now the preacher and instructor in morals in the Pennsylvania State College. He was formerly a Presbyterian.

SALEM.—The churches have just concluded a series of union Sunday evening services with profitable discussions on The Church and the Workingmen. Beside the pastors, Rev. Robert Woods and Dr. S. W. Dike have addressed interested audiences. At the last meeting a number of brief talks were given by working men upon The Value of the Church to Working Men.——The union Good Friday service, which has been observed for years, was held as usual, at which Rev. J. W. Buckham preached and the communion was administered.

NEWBURYPORT.—North. Rev. C. P. Mills, the pastor, has not missed a day in his attendance at the sessions of the State legislature, to which he was elected a representative last fall. He has introduced a large number of bills for a novitiate, among them that formulated by a committee of the State Association on Sunday observance, providing that corporations be required to give all employés one day's rest in seven. April 19 Mr. Mills made the presentation speech, when a fine flag-mast was given to the city near the Court House on the mall by a public spirited citizen.——Belleville. The special services which the pastor conducted for seven weeks last winter were followed by six meetings of those who desired to be confirmed in the Christian life or to learn more about it. The average attendance was 14, all adults but one. There are nearly as many more who have expressed new purpose, but who could not attend the class regularly.

WESTFORD.—A new house of worship was dedicated April 20, to replace that built in 1827 upon the formation of the church. The sermon was preached by Rev. W. A. Bartlett of Lowell and a historical address was given by Miss R. E. Luce, daughter of the first pastor. The church itself is incorporated and will maintain free pews. The work of building has been greatly helped by Mr. C. L. Hildreth, a native of the town, who donated the pews the stained glass windows, the carpet and the organ.

SOUTH FRANKLIN, organized in 1855, has for some time held no meetings, and its numbers were so small that a movement was started some months ago to call a council to disband the church. A paper agreeing to call a council was signed by nine of the 16 members. The council met March 2 and adjourned to April 21, when it advised that the church be disbanded, and voted to grant to the members letters to other churches. The property is in the hands of the society which, however, has not held any meetings for several years.

WORCESTER.—The paper before the Ministers, Meeting, April 12, was by Dr. J. E. Tuttle on The Personality of the Hebrew Prophets as Seen in the Minor Prophets.——The Y. M. C. A. general secretary, W. B. Abbott, has resigned, to take effect June 1, after a service of two and a half years. Under his management the membership has increased from 700 to 2,000, and a floating debt of $11,000 has been paid off.——Edifices of all denominations were crowded to their utmost on Easter.——Pilgrim. Four hundred persons attended the early morning service Easter. The self-denial offering amounted to $506.——Bethany has presented the pastor, Rev. A. G. Todd, with a bicycle, and his wife with a set of silver spoons.——Central. The annual report shows a membership of 421, with additions of 11, nine by letter. The S. S. enrollment is 573. Benevolences amounted to $2,976, and the treasury shows a balance of $438.

SPENCER.—First. The pastor, Rev. S. W. Brown, returned recently from his absence of several months in Florida, considerably improved in health. He occupied the pulpit at Easter. The seating capacity of the house was taxed to its utmost, a large congregation having assembled to greet the pastor.

SPRINGFIELD.—First. New features at Sunday evening services lately have been a ladies' club of 30 voices, violin and cornet soloists, and last Sunday a full orchestra. The pastor, Rev. F. L. Goodspeed, has continued his sermons on Heroes of Our Faith, speaking last on The Covenanters.——Hope. Chaplain E. D. Dillingham of the Connecticut State prison spoke last Sunday evening on Men Behind the Bars.——St. John's. On Easter evening the young people presented a sacred cantata, The Great Light, under the direction of the pastor's wife, Mrs. J. W. Tolliver. The following Wednesday Rev. and Mrs. Tolliver entertained the members of the chorus at their home.——North. Under the auspices of the C. E. Society, Miss Rebecca Krikorian, an Armenian woman, spoke last Sunday evening. The other societies of the city were invited to attend. Since coming to this country Miss Krikorian has raised over $10,000 for her afflicted people.——Emmanuel. The pulpit was occupied Sunday morning and evening by Rev. L S. Gates, who for many years was a missionary in India. In the evening he gave a lecture illustrated with stereopticon views.——South. Holy Week was observed by a service every evening with preaching by the pastor, Rev. Dr. P. S. Moxom. Thursday evening 14 persons were received into the church, all but one on confession. Friday evening eight churches—four Congregational, a Methodist, a Baptist, a Unitarian and a Universalist—united in a service with this church. The congregations at the Sunday services were large. The vesper service is always crowded.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

At the annual meeting of the Worcester North Association, held in Gardner, April 20, it was unanimously voted that the name of Rev. Frederic P. Johnson, late of Ashburnham, be dropped from the rolls, on the ground of his immoral conduct, which, in the judgment of the body, renders him unworthy for the ministry.

Maine

Bath.—Central. Fast Day was observed by a union service with this church, the attendance being noticeably in excess of any for years. The sermon was by the pastor, Rev. A. F. Dunnels. This church reports that with hardly an exception its entire resident membership is pledged to its benevolent work for 1897, and in almost every case to all six national societies. This result has been secured by several special sermons the first of the year, followed up by personal presentation of the work by the pastor in his parish calls.

Easter Sunday was appropriately observed in the State with special sermons, music and floral decorations, and concerts for the Sunday schools. Fast Day followed on the 22d and was observed largely by union meetings of the different denominations.

New Hampshire

Rye.—The recent death of Mrs. Samuel Marden is a great loss to the church, of which she has been a member and an earnest and active worker for nearly 60 years. She was deeply interested in everything that concerned its prosperity.

Henniker.—The parsonage is undergoing thorough renovation preparatory to its occupancy by the newly-chosen pastor, Rev. T. C. H. Bouton, who has been supplying the past winter.

The statistics for 1896 show 866 additions to the churches, 454 on confession, a net gain of 43; 522 baptisms, 174 of infants; 815 removals, 387 by death and 129 by discipline; home expenditures of 171 churches, $255,750, an increase of $39,674; benevolent contributions, $59,641, an increase of $126; legacies, $30,679; in Sunday school, 20,464, a loss of 455; 8,474 in 156 young people's societies; 18,151 families in 174 churches, a gain of 350. One new church was organized.

Vermont

Bellows Falls.—The congregation Easter Sunday was the largest ever seen in the meeting house on a Sunday morning. The pews generally cannot accommodate all the families, and a larger audience-room is needed. The pastor, Rev. J. E. Fullerton, goes out monthly to four preaching stations, and the young people hold three Sunday schools in remote places.

Rhode Island

Providence.—Easter Sunday was emphasized by special decorations and music and sermon themes.——Central's choir of 40 voices contributed to the music of the day with marked effect.——Pilgrim. The Men's Club took charge of the decorations and the printing of the beautiful program for both services. The Brown Symphony Orchestra was present at the evening service. The Sunday school held an Easter service at noon. Each class had a new banner, and a certain rate of attendance will hereafter allow the classes to display their banners.

Pawtucket.—Weeden Street. The title deeds to the church property are now in possession of the trustees and the church feels glad to own its house. Rev. L. D. Wright, formerly assistant of Rev. John Hall, D. D., of New York, has been aiding in a week of Evangelistic services.

Connecticut

Waterbury.—Second. The parish is divided into 70 fields, a lady visitor being in charge of each under a general superintendent. A recent feature adopted by Dr. J. G. Davenport, the pastor, is the holding of a reception in the church parlors at the close of the sermon, to which all are invited, particularly strangers. Communion Sundays a reception is held by the new members to the rest of the congregation, offering a chance to become acquainted. The total charities for last year were $6,436.

Stamford.—The house of Rev. Samuel Scoville was entered by a burglar early last Friday morning. Mr. Samuel Scoville, Jr., on awaking, saw the burglar in his room and, seizing a revolver, snapped it at the intruder, but it did not go off. The burglar fired and wounded Mr. Scoville, but not seriously. Then he ran out, leaving his booty behind.

New Haven.—Dwight Place. Rev. Dr. J. E. Twitchell has returned from a four weeks' trip through the South much benefitted in health. The Sunday school has given a cabinet organ to a new school at Bennett's Bridge.——Howard Avenue. A recent supper was furnished entirely by the men.

Repairs are begun on the Suffield meeting house.——Special meetings have been in progress at West Hartford, Thompson, Higganum, Naugatuck and Hockanum.——Whitneyville has adopted the pledge system in place of pew rentals.——The two clergymen located at South Coventry have conducted a thorough, systematic, house-to house canvass of the town with good results.——Clocks have been placed in the vestry and audience room of the church at Central Village for the first time.

MIDDLE STATES

New York

Binghamton.—First. The Easter offering was $1,200, which pays a floating debt and leaves a balance to apply on the bonded debt. The church has recently listened to Rev. B. Fay Mills in his lectures on The Social Peril, and What Must Society Do To Be Saved? The crowds were so great that hundreds were turned away. The lectures were hopeful and constructive in tone, the point of view being that of Christian socialism.

Brooklyn.—Lee Avenue. The Easter communion was largely attended and impressive, 300 persons participating. The pastor, Rev. J. B. Clark, received 15 new members and baptized five infants. The offering of the morning was the largest in the last five years.

Manhattan.—At the Easter communion service 16 new members were added to the church, 13 by letter. The second quarterly report shows a balance for the quarter of nearly $1,000 after all expenses had been paid.

MRS. S. ELLEN SHUMWAY

Died, March 5, of pneumonia, after a short illness, at her home in Brooklyn, N. Y. Mrs. Shumway was a native of Haverhill, Mass., a daughter of the late John and Susan (Balch) Davis.

In 1857 she was married to William Warren Shumway of New York, and resided after that time in Brooklyn, N. Y., where, as a co-worker with her husband in the Puritan Congregational Church, and later in the Lewis Avenue Church, she soon acquired a wide circle of acquaintances in church and social relations.

Her husband and a family of four sons and a daughter survive her. Loved everywhere for her sweetness of disposition, her tenderest affections clustered about her home. Rarely has mother love been expended so bountifully, or mother solicitude for the welfare of dear ones been more constant and untiring. She was truly the soul of the home, and when she was removed the home life ended. As a sister she was ever thoughtful, devoted, and from the poise of her responsive temperament wonderfully able to calm and comfort in the hour of need.

Mrs. Shumway's heart was drawn to accept her Saviour in early years. She did not talk much of her religious life, she lived it. Said a life-long friend, "In an acquaintance of forty years I cannot recall one expression of murmuring or the ruffling of that sweet, gracious spirit." The love that served, that sought not its own, that, like Mary, sat at the feet of Jesus and adored, was the ruling impulse by nature and by grace of this life that, after a brief sickness, passed into the "fuller vision" of God's love.

My husband read some of them and urged me to try it. Finally he procured a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla and I began taking it. In a few days I began to feel better and I was encouraged to keep on. THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK

The writer has been contending for weeks that general trade was increasing and becoming more satisfactory. Many authorities could not or refused to see any improvement, but it was noted at the close of last week that the general situation certainly was looking better. Furthermore, all the indications point to a continuance of this commercial growth, than which nothing is more needed by the country at large.

Retailers in clothing, shoes and hats report a good trade, and say that it is better than a year ago. People seem to be buying more freely, and, after all, it is the consumptive demand of the masses which makes general business good. To be sure prices might be higher, but Rome was not built in a day, and considerable satisfaction is derived from the fact that, on the whole, prices are tending more and more towards greater firmness.

In iron and steel there is little or no improvement, and Bessemer pig and steel billets have softened another twenty-five cents per ton. Both the bituminous and anthracite coal trades are in unsatisfactory shape, and rumors of strikes in the former are rife. Wool has quieted down somewhat, and dry-goods are moving, but not with snap. Lumber and hardware, together with building materials, are enjoying considerable activity.

Speculative markets continue flat. Money is easy, and gold exports are expected in the near future, because of the heavy importations of foreign goods in anticipation of the new tariff. Copper stocks in this market have been weak.

New Jersey

Montclair.—First. The Sunday school has used the Blakeslee series of lessons for several years; a large and thoroughly organized home department of over 200 members does the same; and now the whole congregation is brought into the system, since the pastor finds his theme for the Sunday morning sermon from the lesson for the day. The church membership is now over 800, and the S. S. enrollment nearly as large. During Lent the pastor gave weekly morning readings from Mathewson's Distinctive Messages of the Old Religions.

Chester, though having accepted the resignation of its pastor, Rev. S. H. Bray, parts with him with regret. At a recent church meeting an arrangement was made by which he will remain for three months longer.

THE INTERIOR

Ohio

Cleveland.—Trinity celebrated its third anniversary Easter Sunday. In three years it has reached a membership of 390 and has built a fine $40,000 building, well equipped for all kinds of modern church work. Its institute has about 200 members. Its Sunday services and prayer meetings are largely attended, and its growth is thorough and substantial. The new members recently received make 61 accessions since last January. The attendance at Easter was larger than ever before in the history of the church, except on dedication Sunday, and in the evening, when the Sacred Music Society rendered Stainer's The Daughter of Jairus, the building was unable to contain all who came. The regular Sunday evening congregations thronged the auditorium. For three months before Easter the pastor, Rev. C. S. Mills, has preached a series of sermons upon The Matchless Life of the Master. Each Sunday evening service has been followed by an evangelistic after meeting.

Springfield.—First. Passion Week was observed, Rev. E. A. Steiner, the pastor, preaching on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings. The semi annual roll-call occurred Thursday evening and was followed by a brief sermon and the Lord's Supper. The exercises were impressive and novel—no such service having ever been held by the church. Easter was appropriately observed.

Illinois

[For other Chicago news see page 606.]

Chicago.—Warren Avenue. Easter morning Dr. J. W. Fifield asked his people for $1,000 to meet bills which the enlargement of the house of worship and other extra expenses had rendered necessary. The money was promptly given.——California Avenue listened to its new organ for the first time and rejoiced in it as an Easter offering to the congregation.——The Church of the Redeemer met all past arrears by asking for and receiving almost as soon as the names of persons could be written down $1,500. Best of all everywhere the spirit of Christ made itself felt in the services of the day.

Indiana

Washington had a good day April 11, Superintendent Curtis being present morning and evening. Rev. Thomas Smith, the new pastor, and his family were received into the church. Three others came

THIRTY DAYS' FREE TRIAL.

We have been advertising this offer for months, selling thousands of mattresses, and not one returned as yet. If you are skeptical about its merits, or don't need one now, send for our handsome pamphlet, "The Test of Time," mailed free for the asking. It gives full particulars.

Dear Sirs:— Through a friend who then had one of your Patent Elastic Felt Mattresses in use, I was first introduced to them. That was in 1881 (16 years ago). I ordered one as an experiment, and I take great pleasure in saying that the results have been in every way satisfactory. Since that time I have procured others from you, until now they are the only kind we have in our house. They retain their shape and elasticity in a manner that makes devotees of Hair mattresses incredulous. All the claims you make for the material and workmanship of your Mattresses seem to me well within the bounds of modesty. With hearty wishes for your success in a business which adds so much to the comfort of the world, I remain,
Yours sincerely, Rev. THOS W. ILLMAN.

Church Cushions.

Calvary Baptist Church,
New York, February 6, 1894.
Dear Sirs:— It gives me much pleasure to say that the Patent Elastic Felt Cushions put by your company into the Calvary Baptist Church more than forty years ago, are still in excellent condition, and I can most heartily recommend them. They have preserved their shape better, and are, in my judgment, in every way more desirable than cushions made of any other material.

Remit by check, money order, express order, or New York draft, and mattress will be shipped same day. Patent Elastic Felt Mattresses are not for sale by stores anywhere. Wretched imitations are offered by unscrupulous dealers—please write us if you know of such cases.

on confession. A Y. P. S. C. E. of 30 members had been organized the week previous and the young people have formed a choir. The Sunday school is large and the wife of the pastor has taken charge of the primary department.

The Kokomo Association at its recent meeting took up the extra-cent-a-day plan for home benevolences which has proved so successful in the Anderson church. About 100 pledges were made.

Michigan

Detroit.—Old First. Prof. Graham Taylor recently preached, his evening subject being The Social Settlement Movement.——People's has enjoyed a series of evangelistic services, under the leadership of Rev. F. A. Miller, during the past two weeks. Many persons have made a start in Christian living. The afternoon chalk talk services for children drew out large crowds of young people, and hundreds signed pledge cards.

Wisconsin

Clinton.—Special services were held during Passion Week by this church with much profit. The congregations are now the largest in the history of the church. Rev. William Moore is pastor.

Angola gave an Easter thank offering for suffering people in India amounting to $13.

THE WEST

Missouri

St. Louis.—Central. At the recent annual meeting the fact was brought out that each member was giving $15 a year for benevolence and $30 for current expenses, in all $45 a year. The church has more than doubled its membership during Dr. C. S. Sargent's pastorate.——Pilgrim, during the past year, has given $12,100 for benevolence.——First has increased its benevolences to $6,058 for the year ending April 15.——Reber Place celebrated its fourth anniversary April 4, with appropriate services.

Minnesota

Cornish.—A church of 32 members was organized April 18, of whom 17 are heads of families, all coming by confession. Many of them were formerly members of Lutheran churches. It will be supplied by Rev. C. A. Ruddock of Winthrop, who had previously held meetings here.

Staples.—About $200 were raised Easter Sunday toward the debt on the church. Progress has been made during the pastorate of Rev. D. W. Cram, especially along financial lines, and the church is becoming one of the stronger organizations in the North.

Accessions to membership at New Ulm and the clearing off of the debt encourage all. The outlook is bright for progress.

Nebraska

Waverly has been supplied for the last two years by Prof. I. N. Lowe of the Wesleyan University. The people have become deeply interested in his work and strongly attached to both himself and his wife. He will close his work soon, and the church hopes to secure a resident pastor.

Cortland.—Union evangelistic services have been in progress for some time and the Congregational church, though pastorless, has entered heartily into the work. Twenty-two of those hopefully converted are already pledged to unite with this church.

Bloomfield is in the midst of an earnest revival interest, Rev. E. J. Sarkis being assisted by Rev. A. F. Houson. The church is greatly strengthened and interest has extended through the town.

Leigh.—The Easter services were rendered peculiarly touching by the sudden death the previous week of the pastor's youngest son. He was buried on Good Friday.

Idaho

Genesee.—Rev. W. C. Fowler received 29 members Easter Sunday, all on confession, and nearly all adults. These have been gathered through a series of meetings conducted by the pastor, aided for three evenings by Rev. R. W. Farquhar of Pullman.

PACIFIC COAST

California

Santa Barbara.—Reports at the recent annual meeting show a prosperous year. Forty-one persons became members, most of them on confession. Ten were Chinese from the mission school. The congregations were never larger and the benevolences amounted to $1,200. Rev. F. S. Forbes is now entering upon the second year of his pastorate.

San Francisco.—Plymouth. Rev. W. D. Williams, the late pastor, was confirmed in the Episcopal faith April 15 by Bishop Nichols at Grace Church.

THE display of handsome things in cut glass and other specimens of rich china for wedding gifts was never in better form than to be seen at Jones, McDuffee & Stratton's, whose warehouse has now the newer designs assembled in their art pottery rooms on Franklin Street.

MESSRS. GILCHRIST & CO. announce in their advertisement on the last page of this issue some very attractive bargains. They make a feature of bicycle garments at very low prices. This is but one of many good values offered by this house, as all their counters are laden with desirable goods at very moderate prices.

MACULLAR, PARKER & CO., who have been so continuous users of our advertising columns, announce this week a special sale of covert overcoats. The standing of the house and the exceptional quality of the garments carried by them are too well known by our readers to demand farther comment. The covert coats are no exception.

As a rule anything that is useful in the winter is not so during the summer months. Hinds's Almond Cream is the exception that proves the rule, being equally efficient in its application to chapped hands and sunburn. It is a delightful article for the toilet at all seasons, and has a very extensive use as such. Mr. Hinds is desirous of introducing his preparation into every home, and makes a special offer to readers of The Congregationalist to send, for a short time, a sample bottle free.

EDUCATION

—— In the death of Prof. Cyrus Morris Dodd Williams College loses the occupant of the chair of mathematics for the last twenty-five years, and a man highly respected by the student community.

—— Yankton College is rejoicing in the genuine revival movement led by Rev. L. P. Rowland of Grand Rapids, Mich., formerly secretary of the Boston Y. M. C. A. A number of students have begun the Christian life and many more have been quickened. The winter session closed March 30, about 200 students having been in attendance during the term.

—— A very valuable collection of sixty six autograph letters and documents long owned by the Winthrop family of Boston has just been presented to the Yale University Library. It includes letters from Rev. John Davenport and Governor Thomas Eaton of the New Haven Colony, from Capt. John Mason, Thomas Hooker, Col. George Fenwick and many others of early New England fame. ——Mrs. Maria Moen of Worcester, who died early in the month, left by her will $10,000 to Hartford Theological Seminary.

THE HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY STRAITENED

The executive committee of the Congregational Home Missionary Society desires to make the following statement of its affairs, as indicated by the receipts and disbursements of the financial year ending March 31, 1897, with the bearing of these figures upon the work and immediate future of the society.

The cash receipts for the last three years and expenditures for the same period are as follows:

RECEIPTS

	Gifts	Legacies	For Old Debt	Total
1894–5.	$218,757	$183,999		$402 756
1895–6.	224,656	233,510	$80,439	538,606
1896–7.	158,536	182,144	17,421	358,103

EXPENDITURES

1894–5	$454,051
1895–6	460,713
1896–7	421,275

The receipts for 1896–7, excluding specials for debt, fell off $117,485 as compared with the preceding year. Including such specials in both years they fell off $180,503. If the receipts had been the same as those for the antecedent twelve months all current obligations would have been met, and the balance of debt, amounting to $34,000, reduced to $10,000.

As the apportionment must be made at the commencement of the year, and no one could foresee such a tremendous falling off in receipts, contracts were sanctioned involving payments in excess of what proved to be the actual receipts, with the result that the society at the close of the year had a net debt, including the balance of the old debt, of $127,505. This was in spite of a reduction in expenditures of $39,438.

The committee is glad to say that by adhering to the policy directed by the society and borrowing at the banks the year was closed free from debt to any of the missionaries, their salaries having been paid in full.

Various reasons have been assigned for this unprecedented decrease in receipts. The hard times undoubtedly have had their effect, but it scarcely seems possible that the past year has been so much worse than the one which preceded it as wholly to account for so large a decline in the gifts of the living.

Having these facts in view and looking forward with some apprehension, the committee has reduced the apportionment for the coming year by cutting down proposed expenditures on the field $53,215, and cutting down the general operating expenses $20,568, a total reduction of $73,783. The work must suffer by reason of this curtailment, but in view of the continued depressed condition of business and the practical experience of the past two years the committee is forced to take this action. It is hoped that increased receipts will enable at least the amount for the field to be restored to the figure reported by the superintendents as absolutely indispensable.

A word should be added as to the immediate outlook. The financial year closed with a debt of $127,505. The current six months constitute the period when least is received ordinarily by the treasury. Last year, including gifts, legacies and contributions for the old debt, the total amount in the corresponding six months was $97,707. The estimated sum needed to meet payments, even under the reduced apportionment due between April 1 and October 1, 1897, is $190,000, thus leaving the deficit for the coming six months, estimating the receipts to be the same as last year, $92,293, and making the total indebtedness of the society to banks and missionaries, according to such estimate, on Oct. 1, 1897, $219,798.

Since in the past the extreme borrowing power of the society has been $180,000 it follows that unless contributions larger than were received last year and legacies now unforeseen shall reduce this amount, the society will stand indebted to its missionaries on the field at that date, in round numbers, $40,000. It should also be remembered that the receipts for the two preceding years were swelled by taking into their account the $166,000 received from the Stickney legacy, which now has been wholly exhausted in supplementing the regular income of the society.

It seems plain to the committee that one of three things is inevitable. Either, first, the contributions from the churches and individuals must be very materially increased; or, second, the society must fail in its obligations towards its missionaries with all of the suffering which that implies; or, third, the work of the society must be cut down still further and to such an extent that years will not suffice to repair the lasting injury inflicted upon the cause of Christ as represented by Congregationalists in America.

It seems to you that that tickling, hacking cough is all in the throat. But your doctor will tell you that this sensation is often deceiving. The cough is often the signal of deeper trouble in the bronchial tubes or in the lung tissue itself. These inflamed membranes can only be healed by treating the system. For all lung troubles, especially in the earlier stages, no remedy equals Scott's Emulsion of Cod-liver Oil. Its special power is in healing the inflamed tissues of the lungs.

In the selection of food care is exercised to secure the best. No attempt is made to disguise, by flavoring in cooking, the taste of decayed meat or vegetables. Why not this same care in the selection of Cod Liver Oil?

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, APRIL 23

Miss E. S. Gilman presided, and read passages selected from Matt. 24 and Acts 4, in harmony with the Easter season, and also appropriate in connection with the condition of affairs in Turkey. Three missionaries from Harpoot were present, also Miss Stone and Miss Kara-Ivanova of Bulgaria. Mrs. Wheeler spoke of the work done by Dr. Wheeler and herself for Euphrates College, and of a possible work yet remaining for her to do in its behalf; of the many new places in that vicinity that are calling for Christian instruction; of the impression which Mr. Ellis had made in his brief work of two years, and of the promise in him of a good and strong missionary, which makes his loss so hard to bear. Miss Wheeler spoke of the 900 pupils at present in the various departments of the institution, of the thankful letters which she receives, and of meetings which she held just before leaving, where hundreds of women assembled. Mother and daughter earnestly begged for prayers in behalf of that people, that, in receiving the help which they absolutely need, they may not become pauperized and drift away from effort for self-support, so strenuously urged and promoted by the missionaries; adding a request for prayer for themselves as they turn their faces westward to visit son and brother, tarrying here and there along the way to speak of the work.

Mrs. Browne, alluding to letters from Mr. Browne and Miss Bush, spoke of the great encouragement they have met in their touring experiences, and Miss Kara-Ivanova added a few cordial words.

The work at Hass-keuy and Gedek Pasha and the missionaries engaged in it were especially remembered, also missionaries in this country and others away from their work, some detained because it has not yet seemed wise to return, as Mrs. Raynolds, Mrs. Allen, Miss Fraser and Miss Huntington of Van. During the interval Miss Fraser has been directing a large relief work in Varna and Miss Huntington has been most useful in the school at San Sebastian. Representatives of several branches were present and gave a few words of Christian salutation.

HAMPTON'S ANNUAL FESTIVAL

The anniversary exercises at Hampton Institute were held a month earlier than usual this year as an experiment, the trustees meeting and the addresses by the graduating class coming on April 22. Many friends from the North who have wished to attend previously have been deterred from doing so by the fact that the exercises came after the weather at Hampton had begun to be too warm. Others were unable to be absent from the great annual meetings of the religious bodies held in May and June. In the South the local elections and the extra work connected with the truck season made it impossible for many to come to Hampton who wished to do so. The change seemed to work well this year, and is likely to become permanent. The weather was perfect, the fresh green of the leaves and the bright flowers on the grounds contrasted beautifully with the sparkling waters of the bay.

President Ogden and Dr. McKenzie made the addresses to the graduating class Wednesday afternoon. Wednesday evening the students listened to brief addresses from others of the trustees who were present. Professor Peabody spoke of the bond which exists between Harvard and Hampton from the reason that Harvard at first tried to educate the Indians. They didn't seem to want to learn Hebrew and Greek, though, he said, and so for 250 years there were no more Indian students at Harvard until now, when a Hampton graduate is there for further training. "Education in this time has come to mean," he added, "not, as it did once, a 'dump' into which everything is unloaded, but a seed out of which is to be brought an infinity of product."

In the light of this expression of opinion it is interesting to know that the Armstrong and Slater Memorial Trade School started this spring is now in active and successful operation. This is felt to mark an important epoch and was made possible by the generous gifts of different friends. This does not make more varied the work of the institute, but, in the words of General Armstrong, makes it more "intensive." Manual training and academic instruction go hand in hand in the academic department. It is believed that this method is best adapted to give the colored man that thoroughness in a trade which will enable him to compete with the foreign mechanics who are constantly coming to this country from Europe. The graduating class this year numbers thirty-seven, including one Indian boy and four Indian girls. With the 320 pupils in the Whittier primary school there are now here 950 students.

To many the most interesting and impressive exercise of Commencement week was the simple service held around the grave of General Armstrong in the little cemetery at the foot of the grounds, where the birds sing in the trees overhead and the waters of Hampton Roads gleam in the distance. The spot has been marked for some time by a rough bowlder brought from Williamstown, his college home. Last week there arrived and was put in position at the head of the grave a huge block of volcanic lava, six feet high, brought from the birthplace of General Armstrong in the Hawaiian Islands. It seemed appropriate that two hemispheres should thus unite to furnish memorials to the man whose life work had been to unite races which originally represented the same two great divisions.

The Literary History of the American Revolution.

Volume I., 1763-1776 (Now ready)
Volume II., 1776-1783 (Nearly ready)

"This work is the result of an altogether new and original treatment of the American Revolution. In the present work, for the first time, in a systematic and complete way, is set forth the inward history of our revolution—the history of its ideas, its spiritual moods, its passions, as these uttered themselves at the time in the writings of the two parties of Americans who either promoted or resisted that great movement."

A History of American Literature During the Colonial Time.

By MOSES COIT TYLER, Professor of American History, Cornell University. New edition, revised. Two volumes, sold separately. 8vo, each $2 50.

Volume I., 1607–1676 Volume II., 1676–1765.

"It is not so much the history of a special development of literature as a series of profound and brilliant studies on the character and genius of a people of whom that literature was the natural product. The work betrays acute philosophical insight, a rare power of historical research, and a cultivated literary habit, which was, perhaps, no less essential than the two former conditions to its successful accomplishment."—GEORGE RIPLEY in The Tribune.

READ OUR GREAT SPECIAL OFFER.

THE AMERICAN EDUCATOR will be completed shortly after June 1st; the finishing touches are now being applied by an army of experts and artists. There will be only two styles of binding—Cloth, at $35.00 a set, and Half-Russia, at $45.00 a set. In pursuance of our original and well-known methods of advertising, we propose to secure immediate and widespread publicity for our new work by distributing the first edition at about one-fifth regular prices, namely, $7.50 for the cloth style (4 vols.) and $9.00 for Half-Russia, this being little more than half the actual cost of making. By so doing we shall secure at once the inevitable verdict of universal popular endorsement. These advance orders at one-fifth price must be accompanied by one-half cash, and our special price holds good only until the work is issued, or until enough orders are received to exhaust the first edition, which may occur within the first few days. Not more than two sets will be supplied to any one applicant. Orders will be accepted and filled in rotation, as received, until the day of publication, after which time no sets will be supplied except at regular prices.

HOW TO ORDER.

Send $3.75, if cloth style is desired, or $4.50, if Half-Russia. You will receive at once a receipt on account, at our special advance price, the balance ($3.75 on cloth style, or $4.50 on Half-Russia) to be sent on notice of publication, when the complete set of four handsome volumes will be at once forwarded. Transportation charges must be paid by purchaser. The special book-case, will be furnished for $1.50 additional. Books guaranteed as represented, or money refunded if set is returned within ten days. We refer to any Commercial Agency, or to any bank or newspaper in Philadelphia. BOOK OF SAMPLE PAGES AND ILLUSTRATIONS FREE ON RECEIPT OF 2c.
